Foreword

THAT politics can be a creative activity, a means whereby man extends his own freedom, is a truth that is periodically forgotten. In 1961 we are still emerging from the political wilderness we entered in 1914 when the old world broke down and chaos ensued. The brave and brilliant attempts of the October Revolution to build a new world came to grief by 1923. Marxism found no answer in Mussolini and Hitler save world war. A whole inter-war generation failed to understand its own problems. Parties that called themselves "Communist" rested upon dogmas and terror. Parties that called themselves "Socialist" rested upon the petty ambitions of their leaders. Politics became a dirty word.

Yet there were fewer illusions in 1945 than there were in 1918 and of these there was not much left after 1953/6, the years of the trials in Yenkurt, Berlin, Poznan, the 20th Congress of the C.P.S.U., the Hungarian Revolution and Suez. And after Suez rose Affaire. Three of their own record common people from Britain to Japan began to move against the Bomb.

A vast debate, deep, initially shapeless and with no respect for the persons of self-styled leaders, swept the old organisations and called new ones into being. That debate has produced results — and this pamphlet is one of them.

Raya Dunayevskaya, Lenin Trotsky's secretary during the Moscow Trials period, broke with Trotsky over the Hitler-Stalin Pact of 1939 and began a searching re-examination of the nature of the Soviet Union. By 1941 she had come to the conclusion that what the world was witnessing was the truth of Marx's prediction that the process of accumulation would end by delivering all capital into the hands of one single capitalist or capitalist corporation. This, she saw, was what had already happened in the Soviet Union. Nationalised property, as such, was not one with the capitalist than private property. The relations between employer and employed under the Five Year Plans were essentially the same as under capitalism elsewhere. She then concluded — having studied the situation in the U.S.A. — that the new shape of capitalism was not peculiar to the Soviet Union but signified nothing less than a new stage in world capitalist development. State capitalism had succeeded or was succeeding monopoly capitalism the world over.

With the aid of this basic theory (including as it does a fundamental belief in the capacity of perfectly ordinary people to Dunayevskaya has elaborated a complex of new socialist ideas involving a rediscovery of the humanism of Marx and Lenin. Her ideas have been expressed in this pamphlet, in her book Marxism and Freedom (reviewed in Appendix II) and in the Detroit monthly paper News and Letters.

In Britain the Labour Party was crushingly defeated at the General Election of the Autumn of 1959. Never had such a well-organized political campaign produced such a miserable result! It was clear that the rethink was more necessary than ever. In Cambridge a group of left-wing students of the University Labour Club began to meet informally to examine more deeply into what was wrong in the Movement and to test their conclusions in the critical atmosphere of the Labour Club and in its journal Cambridge Forward. The publication of this pamphlet is one result of that activity — the Left Group's baptism in publishing and, we hope, a meaningful contribution to the new socialist internationalism.

Introduction

African Realities and World Politics

1960 was the year when sixteen nations in Africa gained their freedom from Britain and France and when Belgium thought it could grant formal political independence to the Congo while keeping its hold economically and militarily. In the rich Katanga province the Congolese people faced the new fact that white imperialism could speak through a black puppet. Three short days after the creation of the Republic of the Congo, Moïse Tshombe declared Katanga's independence and Premier Patrice Lumumba requested U.N. aid. Rooted in this United Nations intervention was a new form of struggle between the two nuclear giants, the Soviet Union and the United States.

Khruschev's performance at the U.N. was designed to make the world forget that Russia voted for U.N. intervention in the Congo. By removing his shoe and thumping the table with it in protest he separated Russia and the United Nations policy over the Congo in the eyes of the world despite his previous approval of the dispatch of United Nations troops. In taking Lumumba's side he was engaged in a battle for the mind of Afro-Asia, for it was Lumumba who, across tribal lines, had built up a truly national movement for independence.

Lumumba had asked for U.N. aid because he thought he could use both Russia and the United States to maintain independence, but before he could make use, he was used.

The murder of Lumumba was the irresistible result of American imperialist countervance with Belgian imperialism and its African puppets against the leadership of Lumumba's Congolese National Movement. The crocodile tears shed by President Kennedy and the U.N. Ambassador were quickly brushed aside the moment it became obvious that Khruschev for his part intended to exploit the murder to establish a foothold through his recognition and support of the Antoine Gizenga regime.

This challenge to the U.N.—U.S. domination of the Congo (and its uranium, cobalt and titanium) led to an immediate American reprisal. Russia backed down, its U.N. Ambassador Valerian Zorin was ordered not to veto the resolution introduced by Cyprus, the United Arab Republic and Liberia to empower the U.N. to use force to stop civil war. Whether the U.N. can stop civil war in the Congo is questionable; that it cannot stop the U.S.—U.S.S.R. struggle for world power is certain. The threat of dismemberment now stalks the tragic Congo. There are already two Germanies, two Koreas and two Viet Nams. Must there now be three Congos?

1960 was a turning point in the struggle for African freedom. Even where Africans, as in apartheid South Africa, were defeated, they electrified the world with their mass burning of the hated passes and brave shouting of "Iwes Lethu" (Our Land). Where they had already gained political freedom, in Ghana and Guinea, they began facing the struggle for economic independence.

Seventeen newly independent nations were born in Africa—the Cameroun, the Central African Republic, Chad, the Congo Republic (one formerly Belgian, the other French), Dahomey, Gabon, the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, the Ivory Coast, Malagasy (formerly Madagascar), Mali (formerly French Sudan), Niger, Nigerin, Senegal, Senegal, Togo and the Voltaic Republic.

By the year's end, light had been shed on the darkest corners of white supremacist rule, not excluding that of the "quiet" dictatorial terror in Portuguese Africa. Sir Roy Welensky's Federation was vigorously challenged by the United National Independence Party round Kenneth Kaunda in Northern Rhodesia and by the Malawi Congress Party with Dr. Banda in Nyasaland.

Although it is all too obvious that Roy Welensky's "multi-racialism" is but another name for Verwoerd's fascist policy of apartheid, white liberals in both Kenya and the Rhodesias have asked why a nationalist rather than a "multi-racial" political party should be used as the instrument of freedom in Africa. To this question, asked by the Reverend Colin Morris, Kenneth Kaunda has replied:

"When you look at the nations in Africa which have achieved the independence we desire, it will be found that a nationalist movement in each case brought about the solution. No multi-racial political party has yet managed to obtain for Africans their independence. We are not concerned solely with the rights of Africans; we are struggling for human rights—the inalienable rights of all men. We are engaged in a struggle against any form of imperialism and colonialism not because it has as its agents white men, but because it has many more wrong sides than good ones..."

I should now add that I believe the only effective answer to our constitutional problems is that the British Government transfer power gracefully from the minority to the majority groups—that is, to the Africans. The happiness that Africans will feel will, I am almost certain, make them forget and let bygones be bygones, and so will be born in North Rhodesia a new state in which black men rule, not to the detriment of any one race, but to the good of all inhabitants because the majority will have nothing to fear from minority groups.” (Black Government, A Discussion between Kenneth Kaunda and Colin Morris).

The outburst of elemental creative activity of the African people has, in the short period of a single decade, remade the map of Africa and thereby that of the world. From the outset, when this movement was still eclipsed by revolutions in Asia and the Middle East, it was clear that a quite new, a higher stage in world development had been reached.

It was met by an orgy of violence when it first appeared in France’s Madagascar during World War II and in Britain’s Kenya after the war. But the Mau Mau experience taught British imperialism a lesson—that henceforth other struggles for independence should be handled with grace in the hope of retaining economic privilege.

Although de Gaulle’s France had learned nothing from its bitter drawn-out war with modern revolutionaries in Algeria, it had learned fromtiny Guinea’s brave resounding “ No!” that it should change its tune in former colonies of sub-Saharan Africa. Since then the tidal wave of freedom has engulfed the former British, French and Belgian empires so that in two short years nineteen independent nations—those listed above added to Ghana and Guinea—have emerged in Africa.

Freedom’s handwriting is on the wall for others. 1961 has already seen the addition of Tanganyika and even where there is a conservative white settler element as in Kenya it is plain that those who are fighting for freedom have no intention of admitting delay. Freedom’s tocsin has been sounded throughout the African continent, West and East, North and South.

A Glance at the 1950’s

As the Africans surge towards freedom the leaders of Russia are ever ready to exploit their own particular perversion of Marxism. That present-day Communism is flatly opposed to the ideas of Marx was made clear by the brutal suppression of the revolution in Hungary. Khruschev’s U.N. performance in the summer of 1960 was translated, by the 81 Communist Parties that met in Moscow in December, 1960, into a theory about “the independent national democracies.” Those who are ready to believe that Russia stands for freedom, at least in Africa, might take a closer look at the record of the fifties. Up until 1953-4, Russian leaders showed very little interest in Africa and called Kwame Nkrumah "a nationalist stooge for British imperialism," a label previously reserved for India's Nehru. Russian Communism was suspicious of the uncommitted non-Communist world, especially in Africa, if for no other reason than that it had no use for it. Nor was there anyone with whom to create a "popular front." There was neither a substantial proletariat nor a significant native African bourgeoisie.

The middle class intellectuals who led the movement were educated not in Moscow, but in the West. If these people had had a dream--and they did--it was not of Russian Communism but of Pan-Africanism. For the time being it could be seen from the example of Ghana, the first country to gain its independence, the leadership was closer to Great Britain than to Russia.

Khrushchev saw a new world emerging that owed nothing to Russia and showed no inclination to follow the Russian path. He had to intervene lest he lose this new world. Hence the performance at the United Nations and the allegedly unstinted support that the manifesto of the 81 Communist Parties gave the "independent national democracies."

In 1956 Khrushchev first declared that imperialist war was "no inevitable." His famous speech against Stalinism at the 20th Congress of the Russian Communist Party permitted him, a Stalinist, to travel henceforth under "unstilted" colours of "Marxismo-Leninismo." He was thus able to appear as an exponent of a theory of liberation before countries which had gained their freedom from Western imperialism by their own sweat and blood.

De-stalinisation was the first step in the change of the Russian Line. But what generated self-confidence and over-confidence in the Khrushchev of the late 1950s was the sputnik. Where Stalin had been wary of neutrals unless he could fully control them, Khrushchev gave them the bear-hug and told them they could go their independent way. The new manifesto explained: "A new historical period has set in in the life of mankind: the peoples of Asia, Africa, Latin America that have won their freedom are beginning to take an active part in world politics." If anyone doubts that "world politics" is Communist politics, let him read the manifesto.

The lesson in "world politics" Khrushchev is giving the Afro-Asian-Latin American world, that war is "not facetiously inevitable," does not mean that the Russia of sputniks and I.C.B.M.s subordinates its policy in any way to that of the West. On the contrary Russia champions "peaceful co-existence" because the war that is "merely inevitable" means that the West is walking on thin ice lest any small war start the nuclear holocaust. Therefore the "independent national democracies" may go far indeed in challenging the United States, and Russia will do all it can to help. In a word, "peaceful co-existence" is the careful nurturing of every crisis from the Congo to Cuba.

To escape being torn between the two warring poles of state capitalism, America and Russia, the African masses must turn directly to the workers in the technologically advanced countries whether they are Russian, West European or American. It is in this context that the American and European struggles against automation, with its division between mental and manual labour, are to be seen.

The self-activity of the Negro in America is the success of the successful Montgomery bus boycott and especially since the sit-ins, is a reservoir of strength for the African revolution. It is not just that the Negro identifies himself with the revolution as a question of colour, it is that he is revolutionary in his everyday life, in his struggle with existing society and in consequence has an immediate and deep perception of the meaning of African revolution. And because of the Negro's unique position in American life he is a spur to the American working class as a whole.

In the mass demonstrations in London against the Sharpeville massacre and in the "Boycott South African Goods" movement, the British common people have shown an affinity with all those fighting for freedom in Africa. This affinity is not limited to demonstrations of sympathy; it is inerest in the daily struggle against capitalism.

Without the aid of the majority of the workers of a technologically advanced country neither the African nor the Asian revolution can escape capitalist exploitation and the bureaucratic State Planner.

In June, 1959, when I first analysed the African revoluations, I asked whether "this great awakening" is to be confined to a half-way house doomed to stand at the cross-roads. Must it choose... one of the two poles of state capital—Russia or America?

The answer I gave to that question then, in the first edition of this pamphlet, seems to me to be as valid today as it was two years ago.

The Afro-Asian Revolutions

Facing independence in 1960, Nigeria, the largest country in West Africa, with a population of some 35 million, confronted anew the question of whether independence would mean a new nation or a place where imperialist exploitation might continue in a country geographically and tribally divided.

Had it to choose between Communism and Mental Rearmament, both equally well heltered and equally trying to bind the movement of liberation to one or other of the two poles of state capital—Russia and America?

Pan-Africanism

The theoretical point of departure for the new type of nationalism called Pan-Africanism would seem to be the philosophy developed by Dr. W. E. B. DuBois, the distinguished American historian who, in 1907, founded the Niagara Movement for full rights for American Negroes.

Unfortunately, just as DuBois' concept of the development of the American Negro has always been based on "the talented tenth" so his philosophy of Pan-Africanism is based on the twin concept of the "talented tenth" or "thinking intelligentsia" working through imperialist institutions. His very first pronouncement in 1919 read: "The Negro race through their thinking intelligentsia demand . . . establishment under the League of Nations of an institution for the study of the Negro problem."

With World War II the scene changed totally. This time the African masses by the million were, and are, demanding freedom. They are on the road to freedom from centuries of imperialist exploitation, an exploitation which always wore a white face. Africa for the Africans now means taking destiny into one’s own hands, not just exchanging oppression with a white face for one with a black face, exhilarating as that exchange may at first.

Pan-Africanism, as a theory, on the other hand, meant the goal of a United States of Africa, including kingdoms like Ethiopia and outposts of American imperialism with native black management like Liberia. Among the leaders who sprang up to lead the movement — and not a few of them were exmarxists — the question of a new nation’s destiny was reduced to a question of administration and power. Only afterwards would they search for an ideology to suit their power.

This certainly was no embodiment of the elemental surge for freedom, as we can see from the example of the West Indian writer the late George Padmore who had been in the Comintern hierarchy for a quarter of a century before he broke with it. His break was organizational rather than on essentials. His Communist, i.e. state capitalism, mentality turned out to be more deeply rooted than ever — now that African peoples too were achieving state power. The Soviet Union remained to him a state power that he looked up to. Not only had he not broken with Russian state power, he was not so break with any state power which he thought he might “use”, including those of Britain, de Gaulle’s France and America.

At the same time Padmore attached himself to the first independent African state, Ghana, as “adviser on African affairs” to Premier Nkrumah. Ghana and Nkrumah he called “Pan-Africanism in action.”

On to Pan-Africanism Nkrumah then grafted Gandhian “non-violence” and Asian “neutralism.” As one enthusiast put it: “In one of the remarkable episodes in revolutionary history, he (Nkrumah) single-handedly quizzed a programme based on the ideas of Marx, Lenin and Gandhi...” Be that as it may, the espousal of such Pan-Africanism is for the purpose of consolidating African movements and making them function within the order of world state capitalism.

This does not mean that things are going so easily subdued. The colonial revolutions of our epoch have brought into being some twenty-two new countries in the Far East, the Middle East and Africa. This historic wave has by no means run its course in West Africa, much less in East Africa, North Africa and

1 Pan-Africanism or Comunism. The Coming Struggle for Africa by George Padmore.
2 J. R. Johnston’s Far Eastern Reality, p. 77. I admit that combining Marx, Lenin and Gandhi is quite a feat. But for a pamphleteer like J. R. Johnston, who defended so far the Soviet Cuba, outing of Europe, Soviet United States of Asia, world revolution, the destruction of non-humanity “as such” the subjugation of the masses and the new passions and new forces to reconstruct society into whatever new beginning we’re to end with Nkrumah as the representative of the new, that’s a rather pathetic. There is nothing to add but to say: “Alas, poor Yorick, I knew thee.”
3 In addition to Nkrumah’s autobiography, Ghana, the reader can make a rapid inspection of his principles as well as those of other African leaders. See the Leopold Seboyer in the October 1958 issue of the Western World which featured a debate on “Independence and Sovereignty of the African Peoples.”
South Africa. Even if we limit ourselves for the time being to West Africa, the question of industrialisation is by no means a one-way capitalist road. Powerful as the two big masses of world capital are, the new nations cease to be half-way houses doomed forever to stay at the cross-road of history once their reliance passes from the governments in the common people of the technologically advanced countries. This is neither mere wishful thinking nor a question of drifting on totally uncharted seas.

Let us not forget that the Korean war was the most unpopular war in American history whilst the Algerian war called for actual mutinies on the part of French youths to fight it. The powers-that-be do not misread these signs; they know that they are being told to keep their hands off the Afro-Asian revolution. On the other hand old radicals seem inclined to dismiss this revolution with 'sympathy' and a knowing look that betokens their belief that there is no road open to Afro-Asia but that of capitalist industrialisation. Their inability to mentally into the new epoch is something that flies in the face of past theory and present facts.

At the Opposite End of the World?

Seemingly at the opposite end of the world from Africa, geographically, industrially and not only in terms of power but also insofar as its advanced, allegedly non-political workers are concerned, stands America. Not only the European intellectuals, but even to the European workers, the American working class appears a mystery. They recognise its militancy in industrial struggles, but because the American worker has not built a Labour Party he appears to be non-political. Yet while it is true that the American worker expresses his opposition to capitalism differently it is not true that he is non-political or less anti-war than his European brother.

The fact that despite the recession and the identification in the popular mind of Republicans with Depression, millions voted for Eisenhower just because he promised to end the Korean war, is proof enough that peace predominated over all other questions in the minds of workers. And in voting the Truman Administration out of office, the working people also limited the new government's tenure of office.

The statement that the Korean war was the most unpopular war in American history did not refer merely to the brainwashing of some American soldiers by Chinese Communists. Soon after there are Governor Faunder and Little Rock than so long will brainwashing by Communists be easy. The most significant thing about brainwashing however, was the speed with which the word was picked up by workers in factories to describe "a talking-to" by management and labour leadership alike).

Our epoch has been rightly characterized as one of struggle for the minds of men. That struggle has just begun.

Truly the Afro-Asian revolutions are not "over there," over two oceans, seven seas and great land masses, while we are "over here" safe, sound and unconcerned. It is not only war than hangs heavy in the air. It is that the new struggle for freedom in "backward" lands is very close to the hearts, minds and aspirations of workers in "advanced" countries.

The thousands of workers and students who turned out to hear Tom Mboya of Kenya in his lecture tour of America are a sign of this. The larger sign is the daily struggle that the workers are carrying on against the conditions of labour which make them wage slaves, the daily struggle against the conditions of labour which transform their whole life's activity into an appendage of a monster automated machine that both over-works them and throws them out of work.

When, where and how the two types of struggle, at different poles of the world, merge into a unified struggle for a totally new society, will to some extent be decided by when, where and how the national liberation movements answer the question — "to what?"

The New Stage of World Capitalism: State Capitalism

It is clear that World War II ended only because the two new contenders for world power, Russia and the United States, had had enough for the time being. As if to prove that peace was only an uneasy interlude between wars, they put markers all along the road — two Germanies, two Chinas, two Viet-Nams.

While the Russians embarked on looting everything in sight from East Germany to Manchuria, the United States the only rich victor, found it had to give rather than take. It promptly embarked on the Marshall Plan "to save" Western Europe from direct assault by proletarian revolution.

The tide of colonial revolutions which were then putting an end to the empires of its "victorious allies" (Britain and France).
the United States could not stem at all. The Far East, the Middle East, the Mediterranean, Africa — all were seething with revolt. It therefore had also to embark on the Point Four programme of aid to the underdeveloped countries. Russia, too, had to embark on the Point Four programme of aid to the underdeveloped countries. Russia, too, found that if it wanted to keep in the race for world domination, it had better begin its own “help to underdeveloped countries.”

The problem for Russia on the one hand, and the United States on the other, is where to get the capital to give underdeveloped countries when capitalism, at its advanced stage of development and decay, is suffering not from “overproduction” and “excess capital” but from a decline in the rate of profit in relation to the mass of capital invested. In a word, the total capital needed for ever greater expansion is woefully inadequate.

How has this come about?

We live in an age when even in a “purely economic point of view Marx’s forecast of crisis in capitalism has moved from theory to life. The decade of the 1920’s underlines vividly the problem of capital in narrow capitalistic terms while, at the same time, it illustrates Marx’s extreme assumption that capitalism would collapse even if “the fully twenty-four hours a day . . . (of the labourers) were wholly appropriated by capital.”

Marx’s contention was that the system would collapse because surplus value comes only from living labour. Yet the contradictory tendency in capitalistic development that results in this exploitation of labour is to use less of living labour and more of machines. The contradiction between sending ever lesser amounts of living labour to set in motion ever greater amounts of dead labour creates, at one and the same time, a massive unemployed army and a decline in the rate of profit.

In the heyday of imperialism, the super-profits extracted from the carve-up of Africa and the colonisation of the Orient seemed to contradist Marx’s prediction so that not only bourgeois economists, but even Marxists of the stature of Rosa Luxemburg wrote that we might as well wait for “the extinction of the moon” as wait for the decline in the rate of profit to undermine capitalism.

Look as the mass of profits are, and heavily as the extraction of unpaid hours of labour weigh on workers’ backs, the truth is that there isn't enough capital produced to keep the crazy capitalist system going with selfsame profit motive on an ever-expanding scale. Just as the 1929 world crisis made this apparent in the advanced countries, so the Afro-Asian revolutions in the 1950's disclosed that, even in prosperous times, the advanced countries no longer have capital sufficient for the development of the underdeveloped economies. So long as the motive force of production continues to be the accumulation of surplus value (or unpaid hours of labour)—whether for private plants or for state space-ships—the straining of the ruling class to secure the full 24 hours of man's labour still fails to create sufficient capital to industrialize the backward lands. Theory and fact have moved so close to each other that it would be hard to find anyone who would claim today that there is an excess of capital anywhere in the world. This is obvious when one looks at underdeveloped economies like India, China, in Africa and Latin America. It is just as obvious in Western Europe, the United States and Russia. After centuries of world domination, capitalist economists must now admit that two-thirds of the world is still starving, and the other third is busy inventing ways to appropriate ever more of the worker's labour.

Essentially there is no difference in this between private and state capitalism. Nineteen sixty-one brought dramatic confirmation when the greatest award that mighty Russia could find to give to the first world communist, Major Yuri Gagarin, for his phenomenal achievement of orbiting the earth, was to grant him, his wife and two children, a four room apartment in place of the two rooms they had occupied up to that point.

There are some discerning bourgeois economists who, seeing the hopeless impasse of capitalism, wish to sell the idea of a 'Christian' internationalism to the West. They feel that if they can invent some sort of installment plan on which to base this idea, it would not be "too heavy a burden" for the capitalist class to bear and at the same time be sufficiently palatable to leaders in the underdeveloped areas who would thus choose...
"democratic capitalism" against totalitarian Communism, i.e., state capitalism.

One such discerning economist is Barbara Ward, chosen by Nkrumah, Premier of Ghana, to deliver a series of "lectures on world affairs" at the University of Ghana. She said: "America's foreign ventures are barely one-fifth of Britain's in the heyday of foreign lending . . . Shortage of capital is the world's trouble today, not the struggles of rival capitalists to go out and invest."7

Nevertheless Miss Ward wants to convince the West both to invest and to give outright. She said: "The peoples of Afro-Asia have no intention of stretching the industrialisation of their economies (not to mention land reform and caste reorganisation) over centuries. It is precisely this snail's pace of modernising the economy in India which has turned the coloured world to look longingly at China. A seemingly new path to industrialisation was being carved out by China. By usurping and transforming the Marxist concept of liberation and using it in swiping away the corrupt Chiang Kai Shek regime, the power of Mao's China to attract the coloured peoples of the world was greatly enhanced. Neither the Korean War nor the first seizure of Tibet changed the impression of freedom and of creative energies newly released for the reorganisation of the semi-feudal regime on new foundations. Compared to the snail's pace of industrialisation of India, China with its Russian-styled Plans seemed to have leapt a thousand years into the technologically advanced world, challenging Britain's production of steel."8

It soon turned out, however, that whatever "great leap forward" was made, was made on the backs of the masses, for them. What was being established, as the result of toil from dawn to dusk, was not a new society but state capitalist totalitarianism. The attempt of Mao's China to go one better than Russia, through the establishment of barrack labour, barrack discipline and barrack family life in what the Chinese Communist Party dared to call "Communes," made its new coloured nations have second thoughts. It is not that the Tibetan revolt matched the grandeur of the Hungarian Revolution with its Workers' Councils, nor were the Tibetans the first to revolt in the face of bureaucratic Communism. Years before, the Vietnamese peasants, unrelenting in their struggle against French imperialism, had turned away from Ho-Chi-Minh. But times were not then ripe for other coloured peoples to look again at Asian Communism. Today, however, Africa is ready to question the Chinese path to industrialisation.

The Intellectual Bureaucrats and the Labour Bureaucrats

The greatest obstacle to the further development of these national liberation movements comes from the intellectual bureaucracy which has emerged to "lead" them. In the same manner the greatest obstacle in the way of the working class overcoming capitalism comes from the Labour bureaucracy that lends it.

Ever since the depression of 1929 showed the bankruptcy of the exploitation of private property, the middle class intellectual has embraced the State Plan. Instead of working, as previously, with the native middle class he leaves the city to found and control the peasants against the private native capitalists who are tied to imperialism such as Chiang Kai Shek. His descent upon the countryside to lend and mislead the peasantry, may be from a Parisian cafe table or it may entail the greatest personal sacrifices, but where he doesn't come to the position 'naturally' (i.e. through counter-revolution as in Russia, where he is openly designated as the ruling class) he is perfectly willing to sacrifice whatever is necessary in order that he might become the representative of the State Plan in field and factory.

The inescapable fact is that in this epoch of state capitalism, the middle class intellectual, as a world phenomenon, has trans­formed "individualism" into "collectivism," by which he means nationalised property, state administration, State Plan.

In the post-war years this has cropped up everywhere, from the "socialist" trade unions of Israel (which are at the same time the biggest owners of factories), to the young officers who fought Israel in the name of Arab nationalism. It now appears in Iraq as a native brand of Communist nationalism challenging Nasser nationalism.

In backward land or advanced, the intellectual bureaucrat is a firm ally of the Labour bureaucrat against the proletarian revolution. His job is to control the peasant revolt, or any popular revolt, and prevent their self-development.

The prototype and master of them all is, of course, the ruler of China, Mao Tse-Tung, once a marxist revolutionary. In the 1925-27 Chinese Revolution Mao discovered the revolutionary potential of the peasantry. When the great revolution was defeated in the cities Mao discovered that the peasant revolt, just because it was so isolated from the centre, i.e. the seat of government, could continue. Contrary to what all other marxist revolutionaries before him had done when a revolution was defeated, Mao went, not to prison or into exile, but into the mountain vastness to become a guerrilla fighter.

Irrespective of the fact that Mao no longer had a mass following, the thing that was new, and which seemed to be merely a matter of self-defence, was the transformation of a peasant following (not excluding bandits) into an armed force. As any war lord, he saw to keeping this army disciplined and in position, whether that meant the famous 6000 mile Long March, forced upon him by Chiang Kai Shek's relentless attack or just a raid on a village for supplies. Never before in the history of marxist movements did a leader build an army where there was no mass movement.

The second feature flowed from the first. The Party, without a mass following and with its principles relating to follow the leader principle, was then and forever bent on power. But power cannot really be won without a mass movement, and to build such a movement, principle, a theory of liberation, marxism, was essential. But Mao made sure that no matter what allegiance was sworn to principles in general, in particular people followed Mao.

1 See The Philosophy of Nationalism by General Nasser.
If anyone dares to refer to the principles of Marxism they get the following vulgar answer: "There are people who think that Marxism can cure any diseases. We should tell them that dogmas are more useless than cow dung. Dog can be used as fertilizer."

Thirdly, and of greatest importance, is consciousness of a centre, of state power. Even if that centre of power at first be only a cave, it is the strategically located form of power. The raiding party returns there with its supplies. The military departs from there with its instructions. The party propagandists get their interpretations there and bring to it their reports. Everybody works to support it, build it up, develop the "cadre for taking over power."

By the time Mao's Army-Party cadre met the city workers, it had actual state power and the workers were forced to recognise that they must work harder:

"We must by no means allow a recurrence of such ultra-left erroneous policies as were adopted toward the petty and middle bourgeoisie by our party in the period from 1931 to 1934, the adoption of unnecessarily high standards in working conditions; excessively high income-tax rates; short-sighted, one-sided views of the so-called "welfare of the toilers" instead of making our objective the development of production, the prosperity of our economy, the taking into account of both public and private interests of both labour and capital."

The struggle for power may require that the confiscation of land mean no more than reduction of usurious taxation, or it may mean that it go outright to "communes." In all cases and at all times the leaders lead and the masses toil. And when "excesses" are stopped, as for example in December, 1958, "Mao's Thought" will prevail: "One must have eight hours sleep and not work more than 12 hours a day."

In our epoch of state capitalism, whether industrialisation be quick or slow, the outlook of the totalitarian state ruler permeates down to the lower strata of the intellectual bureaucrats in power or out of it. This is why George Padmore so admired "the political genius" of Mao. He did not take fright at barracks labour because he was sure of his place among the leaders. With elation he quoted Mao on cow dung as being more useful than Marxist "dogma." That is how he fought what he called "dogmatic Marxism," i.e. any pricipled opposition to unprincipled opportunism.

17 Mao Tse Tung: "On the Present Situation and Our Tasks," December 25th, 1947, also quoted in Moscow and the Communist Party by John H. Kautsky.
“Socialism Cannot be Introduced by a Minority, A Party”

Just as marxism developed in opposition to state socialism (represented in Marx's day by Lassalle) so marxism in Lenin's day developed in total opposition to any short cut to workers' power.

Lenin went so far as to say that the very principle of smashing the old state machine, the thing which marked the proletarian revolution, did not distinguish it: "The petty bourgeoisie in a frenzy may also want as much."

What did distinguish the socialist revolution was the way it was accomplished — from below: "We recognize only one road, changes from below, we wanted workers themselves to draw up, from below, the new principles of economic conditions." The smashing of the old state machine, done between October, 1917, and February, 1918, was the easiest part of the job. The difficult, the decisive task, followed. "The population, he continued, must 'to a man' run the state and manage the economy and for that: "It is necessary to abolish the distinction between town and country, as well as the distinction between manual workers and brain workers."

The proof that that was the goal of genuine communism lay in the fact that the formulas of genuine communism differed from the pompous involved phrase-mongering of Kautsky, the Mensheviks, the Social Revolutionaries and their beloved 'brethren' of Berne, in that they reduced everything to the conditions of labour.

If, then, the Communist Party did not become bureaucratized and did not begin thinking that it can do for the masses what only the masses can do for themselves, then and only then could people move to socialism.

"Every citizen to a man must act as a judge and participate in the government of the country, and what is most important to us is to enlist all the toilers to a man in the government of the state. That is a tremendously difficult task, but socialism cannot be introduced by a minority, a party." This was not said merely for outside consumption. It was said to a Party Congress. Nor was it said by a man on the way to power. It was said by a man in power in order to stress that the party should not, in the revision of its programme, forget how and why it came to power. He said it to stress that a party in power is still but a minority of the class; whereas socialism

"can be introduced by tens of millions of people when they have learned how to do everything for themselves."

It was exactly this kind of perspective that impelled Lenin, two years afterwards, when the colonial revolutions burst upon the historic scene, to make there a new point of departure in his theory.

A New Point of Departure in Theory: Colonial Revolts under Imperialism

"Can we recognize as correct the assertion that the capitalist stage of development of national economy is inevitable for these backward nations which are now liberating themselves . . .?"

Lenin asked this, and then in the name of the Commission on the National and Colonial Question he answered unequivocally:

"We must reply to this question in the negative . . . we must . . . give theoretical grounds for the proposition that, with the aid of the proletariat of the most advanced countries, the backward countries may pass to the Soviet,
and after passing through a definite stage of development, to Communism, without passing through the capitalist stage of development."

It cannot be stressed too much that these precedent-breaking statements came from a man who had spent decades fighting the Narodniki (Populists) of his own country, people who had maintained that Russia could skip the capitalist stage of development.

Just as Nehru today thinks that through the Panchayat (village council) India can go directly to socialism so the Narodniki thought Russia could do that through the nar. Lenin fought them bitterly and won the theoretical debate. History has certainly upheld his judgment.

Only something very fundamental and objective could have wrought such a complete change in Lenin's conceptions. Two world-shaking events brought about this transformation. Firstly the 1917 Revolution had established a workers' state that could come to the aid of a land even more backward technologically than Russia, whilst secondly the colonial revolutions themselves illuminate the revolutionary role of the peasantry in the imperialist epoch.

It was this knowledge of the present stage of the imperialistic development of capitalism and the specific stage of national revolutions that impelled Lenin, ever since the Irish rising of Easter Week, 1916, to stress that not all initiative at all times comes only from the working class. He did not change this position when the proletariat did achieve the greatest revolutions in history — the October Revolution in Russia. That revolution only underlined the truth of history’s dialectics: just as small nations fighting for independence could unleash the socialist revolution, so the working class of industrialised countries achieving the revolution could help the underdeveloped countries avoid capitalist industrialisation.

This point of departure in theory — industrialisation without capitalism — rested, of course, on the proposition that the working class of the advanced countries could and would come to the aid of their brothers in the underdeveloped countries. This page of Comintern history was lost, not only by Stalin whose policy ruined the Chinese Revolution of 1925-27, but by Trotsky who chose just this moment to revive his theory of permanent revolution.

The idea of a permanent revolution, i.e. one that would not stop at the bourgeois but continue to the proletarian or socialist stage, was first developed by Karl Marx as a lesson to be drawn from the 1848 European revolutions. In 1903-06 Trotsky developed this theory both as analysis and anticipation of the 1905 and 1917 Russian Revolutions. While, popularly, permanent revolution became simply synonymous with world revolution, Trotsky in 1930 stressed that his conception of it was that “the theory of permanent revolution established the fact that for backward countries the road to democracy passed through the dictatorship of the proletariat.”

Just when the era of state capitalism deepened the truth of Lenin’s analysis of peasant and national revolt, Trotsky more strongly then ever emphasised his theory with the contention that the peasant revolt in China had been nothing but remnants of proletarian struggle and would arise again only after new stimulation from the proletariat.

First, according to Trotsky, in Tsarist Russia the ability of the socialist revolution to succeed was supposed to depend upon the working class leading the peasants; then later it came to signify the Party leading the proletariat; finally it was a question of the workers’ state apparatus swallowing up the trade unions. That is why in his will, Lenin had to war against Trotsky's "administrative mentality." In the end, what began as a brilliant prophecy of a development in Russia showed itself in later life to be just the blinkers needed not to see what was developing in China.

Trotzky's Theory of Permanent Revolution in the Light of Present Day China

Trotzky's own words (about his estimation of the role of the peasantry) speak much louder than any Stalinist charge against him for "underestimating the peasantry." Where Mao at least grasped the new in the peasant revolt, in his 1927 report on Hunan Province, Trotsky was at one with Stalin in disregarding it.

When, in 1930, he returned to the theme of the Russian Revolution he wrote: "The fact that the peasantry as a whole found itself possible once more — for the last time in their history — to act as a revolutionary factor testifies at once to the weakness of the capitalist relations in the country and to their strength." This judgment comes despite the facts that he wrote of Lenin: "This exposition of the genuine historic meaning of the Russian agrarian movement was one of the greatest services of Lenin."

Trotzky claimed that on the agrarian question he was a pupil and follower of Lenin. One must question what he learned and whether it had been won, in 1916, 11 years after the 1920-27 Revolution, he denied the peasantry even a sense of national consciousness, much less any socialist consciousness: "The peasantry, the largest numerically and the most atomised, backward and oppressed class, is capable of local uprisings and partisan warfare, but requires the leadership of a more advanced and centralised class in order for this struggle to be elevated to an all-national level."

In his last writings, in 1940, he tirelessly repents both his concept of the Russian Revolution and the theory of the perma-not revolution: "By itself the peasantry was incapable even of formulating its own interests... I repeatedly returned to the development and the grounding of the theory of the permanent revolution... the peasantry is utterly incapable of an independent political role."

A theory thus far removed from the realities of the age of imperialism and state capitalism had to collapse of its own bellowanness. That present-day Trotskyists can swear by both Trotsky's theory of the permanent revolution and the Mao "Communes" only shows that weightless abstractions and an administrative mentality would rather hold on to some state power than entrust elemental mass revolt to undermine authority.

Such ideas must not be allowed to blind us to the surge of the colonial revolutions. The maturity of our age is seen in the fact that even a mere police revolution, as in the case of the officers' revolt in Egypt, was pushed by the revolutionary upsurge of the peasant masses and students to undertake some land reforms and to promise "revolutionary changes."

The point is not to start with the economic situation alone — the world stage of capitalism — but with political maturity. A people fighting and dying for freedom is mature enough to take destiny into its own hands, not just politically but in the very ground of politics — the kind of labour man performs.

People advanced enough to question the kind of labour man performs at the stage of automation have moved from the answer of more and more machines. They see that the class answer is the humanist answer. It remains to say what that is.

Marxist Humanism

Man does not live by bread alone; but he must have bread to live. The human materialism of Marx holds both the immediate and long-term answers to the present colonial revolutions.

Present-day Communist attacks on humanism are neither accidental nor are they hair-splitting points of doctrine. They concern nothing less fundamental than whether these national revolutionary movements, as well as working class movements, shall emerge from the death-grip of state capitalism.

We need to be aware that Stalin chose to revive the Marxist theory of value right in the midst of World War II as the heroic 25 Experiences in Revolution by J. & S. Lacouture.

Russian people were driving back the Nazi invaders. 1943 was chosen as the year for a seemingly pedantic article, "Some Questions of Teaching Political Economy," because that was the year the Russian production managers "discovered" the American assembly line technique. It was Stalin's way of telling the Russians not to expect a change in the conditions of labour after the war.

Because Marx's theory of exploitation is built on his analysis of the law of value as the law of capitalist development, the Russian theoreticians, up until 1943, had denied the operation of that law in their country, an allegedly classless society. A revision of Marxism was necessary to make it possible, at one and the same time, to admit the law of value operating in Russia and still claim that it was "a socialist land." It took the form of asking teachers not to follow the structure of Marx's Capital.

As I wrote in my Marxism and Freedom: "Marxism is a theory of liberation or it is nothing. Whereas Marx was concerned with the freedom of humanity and the inevitable waste of human life which is the absolute general law of capitalist development, Russian "communism" rests upon the mainspring of capitalism — paying the worker the minimum and extracting from him the maximum. This they dub "the Plan." Marx called it the law of value and surplus value" (p.24).

Just as the break of 1943 with the marxist analysis of value meant the continued exploitation of the Russian workers, so the 1955 attack on the humanism of marxism, in Hungary particularly, meant their continued imperialist control of Eastern Europe and their new intervention — by economic aid — in the colonial world.27

Some there are who think that Russian Commumists' aid is different from that of American Imperialism's Point Four programme. Others, as we have seen, are so desperate to sell 26 The article was first published in "Pod Znamenom Marxizma" (Under the Banner of Marxism) No. 7-11, 1943. It was translated by me and published in American Economic Review, May 1944, and was republished in 1955 with a supplement "A New Revision of Marxist Economics." This caused a controversy in this journal and at the end of it I came back with a supplement "Revision or Reaffirmation of Marxism" both the economics and the one over the 1955 revision of Marxist humanism are dealt with at length in my Marxism and Freedom.

27 See Questions of Philosophy (1955), available only in Russian. When the debates moved from the theoretical to the practical field of attacking and putting down the revolution in Eastern Europe it was well documented in Polish and Hungarian journals. Much of the material has since been made available in English.
"Christian internationalism" to stop Communism that they claim that only one per cent of U.S. national income is needed to build up the underdeveloped countries. The truth is that neither Russian state capitalism nor the profits of the U.S. and "its wealthy allies" (including the wealth of the Krupp empire of West Germany) will ever rebuild the world economy.

The world economy must have totally new foundations operated by motive forces other than mere machine building and private or state profit. Only a qualitatively different kind of labour, one that comes from the release of the creative energies of the common people, can reconstruct the world on new human foundations.

We do, however, live in the atomic age. Atomic energy and automated machines could accelerate the whole industrial development to a point where Biblical miracles would be poor imaginative material. This is not utopia, nor tomorrow. Technologically this is today.

Power plants fuelled by atomic energy are already in operation. Kremlin claims plans to blast lake sites in barren Russian areas. Big business circles in America say there are plans in progress for blasting a huge harbour in northern Alaska with a single atomic explosion.

But if atomic energy is used to create man-made lakes in the Sahara and Gobi Deserts, to move mountains so that rain may fall where now there is drought—if these are not utopian dreams but things technologically possible today, it would nevertheless be the height of foolishness to imagine that capitalism, private or state, is or will be capable of their realization.

Not only will capitalism not do it for the underdeveloped countries, it cannot do it for itself. Khrushchev's Russia, like private corporations in America that demand plush "cost plus" contracts, must spend billions on rocket development, not for the touted "space exploration," but for intercontinental ballistic missile production. Both poles of world capital are busy forcing science to work for a nuclear war, a war that might very well spell the end of civilization as we have known it.

By the expression "forcing science" I do not mean to say that science, as at present constituted in a class society, plans to do otherwise. This, too, Marx foresaw long ago. In 1844 he wrote: "To have one basis for life and another for science is a priori a lie."

Marx foresaw the impose of modern science not because he was a prophet but because he took the human being as the measure of all development, and therefore saw that at the root of all class divisions was the division between the mental and the manual, between science and life itself.

If there are any who still think that anything but an exploitative society could result from such a basic division, let them take a second look at both Russia and America and see where science has led them to. The duality that pervades capitalist society and invests each thing with its opposite, has led to automation, something which instead of fructifying man's labour simultaneously overworks him and throws him out of work. From the splitting of the atom came not the earth's greatest source of energy but its most destructive weapon.

The discerning scientist, for all his middle class identity, can see this now. It was Dr. William Pickering who stated that no matter who drops the bomb first—"we are one-half hour's distance away from total annihilation." Since, continued Dr. Pickering, the scientists cannot help themselves, we must find an entirely different approach to life, "a new unifying principle from the heart and mind of man."

Such a unifying principle can be nothing but marxist humanism. It is the point of unity also between the masses in the underdeveloped countries and the common people in the advanced countries. It is just for this reason that Russia engages in the struggle against humanism. The endorsement of revolt against the Russian tyrants is uncompromising and continuous. In the satellites it gives them no respite.

The revolt has been reflected even within the ranks of the Communists. Thus in 1935/6, Imre Nagy, who had been expelled from the Central Committee of the Hungarian Communist Party, wrote a letter in which he accused the Central Committee that when the masses turn to humanism it is not because they "want a return to capitalism... They want a people's democracy where the working people are masters of the country and of their own fate, where human beings are respected, and where social and political life is connected with the spirit of humanism." 25

In the Petofi Circle, the Hungarian Communist writer, Tibor Dury, declared on June 19th, 1956, "We have been fighting for so many things that we have forgotten the chief thing — humanism." But the ruling bureaucracy would listen to none of this, especially since humanism was spelled out to mean

"Introducing self-management in the factories and workers' democracy."

As the whole world knows, the next stage in humanist struggle was not theory but action — the Hungarian Revolution.

The ruthless totalitarian machine which crushed that revolution bore the not-so-smiling faces of Khrushchev and Brezhnev recently returned from their junkets in Burma, India, Malaysia and their talks to people there about freedom from colonialism!

It was then that the Russian Communists bore down on all humanists. Kommunist (No.5 -1957) gave out the line: Leninism "needs no sort of 'humanisation' nor any of the reforms proposed by the proponents of 'humanist socialism.' By then, the ruling Polish Communist bureaucracy had accepted the line and the attack was launched against all "revisionists."

Jerry Mirowski, Politburo member wrote on the eve of the Writers Congress: "All revisionists describe themselves as creative marxists. There is only one Marxism: the one that guides the party."29

This Party attack had to be that precise because it was from Poland that humanism had emerged and inspired the Hungarian Revolution. Though the Poles themselves stopped short of revolution, they made some attempt to take a stand on principle after the crisis in Hungary. Thus, Nova Cultura of April 28th, 1957, stated:

"The Communist ideal demands the liberation of humanity — and of the individual within the framework of society — from alienation in all the domains of society. The aim is to obtain the real sovereignty of the masses, to destroy the division between those who are deprived of freedom and the ruling group which is not responsible to the people. The idea of Communism, of humanism put into life, is universal."

By 1959 the iron curtain was shut tight and the Third Party Congress of the Polish Party directed a good deal of its resolution against "the revisionists, forcing with pseudo-left wing phraseology... (that) pushed many honest, but ideologically weak comrades into the ranks of demagogues who with the help of demagogic slanders presented themselves as allegedly the only authentic defenders of Marxism and Communism."29

29 Those who cannot follow the Polish publications can find many translations in the magazine East Europe. Jerry Mirowski's report is in the February, 1959, issue.
On the last day of the 21st Congress of the Russian Communist Party (February 6th, 1959) their chief, M. B. Mitin—who bears the exalted title of ‘Chairman of the Board of the All-Union Society for the Dissemination of Political and Scientific Knowledge’— told us where to look if we were searching for true humanism. "The magnificent and noble conception of Marxism-Leninist socialism’ was in Khruschev’s Report." The slogan, "If you can’t lick ’em, join ’em!" seemed to hold. The hypocrisy was evident in the very next paragraph. Mitin hit out against all "revisionists" and especially against "Yugoslav revisionism."

"What is it if not apostasy, if not full retreat from Marxism, ideologically to claim as they do that the development of the socialist state signifies a bureaucratic state trend, that the principle that the socialist state plays a decisive role in the building of socialism and communism is nothing but a 'pragmatic state revision of Marxism.'"

The reason this struck a raw nerve among the Russian Communists was not, however, due to theory, deviationist or otherwise, but because Tito knows the importance of the new Afro-Asiatic mosaic. He travels widely among the "neutral" countries and does so for the purpose of exposing Russia’s role.

5 Pravda, February 6th, 1959. It is translated in the "Current Digest of the Soviet Press," June 3rd, 1959. This "Digest" is generally the most authoritative publication available to English-speaking peoples since it carries nothing but translations from the official Communist press.

6 This characteristic not only the Communists, but the Trotskyites too. In the winter and spring issues of "International Socialist Review" (1939) they opened an attack on the philosophical runnings of the young Marx. These polemics, entitled "Socialism and Humanism," reveal, in that humanism was a stage idea, "passed through." William F. Wende, their author, prevals in an essay great writing the pronouncements of the latter-day Marx.

The Communists themselves, after a delay of 32 years, brought out an English edition of Marx’s Economic-Philosophical Manuscripts of 1844 only in 1959 to have some historical footnotes. Does Wende go along with the "economic editor" in this book? Where Marx writes: "Communism is such as is not the goal of human development—the form of human society," the Communist answers: "Under communism as such! Marx here means classless, equalitarian communism . . . . It is not Marx’s alleged criticism of "equalitarian communism" that bothers today’s Communists. What can be the squabbles in Marx’s representing the nationalization of property, but the protection of the individual. Thus his prophetic warning against State Communism: "We should especially avoid re-establishing society as an abstraction opposed to the individual. The individual is the social entity."
The question is — what does Tito propose in its stead? Whether state capitalism calls itself ‘Communist’ or not, it has nothing more than private capitalism to sell. Both attempt to stop the new forces finding the path to immediate freedom.

The leaders of the African Revolution are not relying solely on the creative energy of the masses, proletarian, peasant or primitive, not because they are independent of “doctrinaire marxism” but because they are dependent upon the capitalist road to industrialisation.

Of course the underdeveloped countries do need help. First of all they want water. But where the economy is not under the workers’ control — and it is nowhere in that condition at the moment — the help will be miserly, with strings attached calculated to involve the recipient in one of the power complexes that are bent on nuclear war.

Short of finding the principle that unifies their struggle for freedom with that of the common people of the advanced countries, there is no way out. There is no in-between road via Pan-Africanism, and the road via the Chinese Communes is a short cut not to freedom but to totalitarian state capitalism.

The fact that there is no way out except by a unified struggle of the masses the world over does not condemn the colonial and ex-colonial countries to ‘inevitable’ capitalist development.

A people mature enough to fight for its freedom is mature enough to take destiny into its own hands in the matter of reconstructing its own society. Marxist clichés are no bad as any others and it is a cliché of no earthly validation to tell a people that has no working class to speak of, that “only if the proletarian revolution occurs . . .” etc., etc.

It was just this task that was Lenin’s new departure in theory. The revolutionary initiative is not always with the working class. The road to Berlin may lead through Peking, said Lenin in the days of Sun Yat Sen. The overwhelming majority of the population of the world is in the East and one must take the new elemental force of the colonial revolutions as a new point of departure in theory.

This is no longer theory but fact. To disregard it is to read oneself out of history. The proof lies in the opposition to Communist totalitarianism which has taken a humanist form both in theory and practice. The same is true of the Afro-Asian revolutions against Western imperialism. The same is true in the workers’ movements in the technologically advanced countries. The freedom movements everywhere have an international character. The tremendous demonstrations in Japan were aimed both against Eisenhower and Kishi. The protest against the murder of Lumumba was world-wide. World-wide also is the support of Cuban Revolution. The refusal of the Belgian workers to lie down to the Loi Unique, the determination of young Americans to end racial discrimination by sit-ins, the gathering anti-war feelings in the Aldermaston Marches of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament—all these manifestations of yesterday and today will deepen tomorrow. They sound the call for a different politics, a new world order. Mankind will not sit idly by and see itself destroyed.
APPENDIX I.

The New Humanism: African Socialism

At a time when the weary American intellectual has been so lethargically bathed by the Cold War and the threat of nuclear war between America and Russia, that he declaims "The End of Ideology," the world that is fighting for its freedom at the cost of its very life—Africa—is charged with the dynamism of ideas. As Leopold Sedar Senghor put it in his June, 1959, report for the Constitutive Congress of his Party of African Federation:
"A nation that refuses to keep its rendezvous with history, that does not believe itself to be the bearer of a unique message—that nation is finished, ready to be placed in a museum. The Negro African is not finished even before he gets started. Let him speak: above all, let him act. Let him bring like a leaven, his message to the world in order to help build a universal civilization."1

At a time when the African revolutions are redrawing the map of the world, the arrogance of white civilization shows itself not only in the ruling class but amongst many Western socialists.
Thus Sidney Lens writes as if the Africans' theoretical contributions are comprised of Tom Mboya's "one man, one vote."2 Leaving aside for the moment that "one man, one vote" discloses nothing short of a revolution against white domination that parades as "democratic civilization," these intellectuals have a long way to go before they equal the African's intellectual grasp, not to mention his courage, daring, and totality of devotion to the struggle for freedom.

In his speech Senghor said: "Let us recapitulate Marx's positive contributions. They are: the philosophy of humanism, economic theory, dialectical method." Senghor speaks with the simplicity that comes from a profound understanding both that socialism is humanist and that socialism is a method. The fact that he aims to combine Marxism with utopian socialism

Leopold Sedar Senghor, African Socialism, American Society
Sidney Lens, "The Revolution in Africa," Liberation, January, as well as with religion in order to create what he calls an "open socialism" or an "African type of socialism" is not without subjective motivations. But this does not obscure the fact that he wishes the humanism of Marx to be the theoretical foundation for a triple synthesis of: (1) traditional African civilization, (2) the results of the encounter of this civilization with colonialism and French civilization, and (3) the economic resources and potentialities of Africa and their necessarily interdependent relationship with the economics of the industrially advanced countries.

So powerful and polarizing a force is the marxist theory of liberation that throughout the Middle East, the Orient and Africa, there are attempts by various religions, Buddhism, Christianity and Mohammedanism, to find a bridge to it, even as there is a similar attempt on the part of Communist China and Russia. It is not here maintained that opportunism like that also characterizes the African intellectual, rather it seems to me that part of their critique of Marxism is due to the realities of present-day Africa which did not form (and could not have formed) part of Marx's thought. Other parts of Senghor's critique of Marxism, especially on present-day economies are however either wrong, or, as in the case of religion, over subtle. "The utopia of Marx," writes Senghor "can be considered a reaction of Christian origin against the historical deviation of Christianity."

Oppression in Africa has always worn a white face. This weighs so heavily on Africans that they are liable to react against any white face, even that of the worker. Thus Senghor claims that the standard of living of the European masses rose "only at the expense of the standard of living of the masses in Asia and Africa," and that, therefore, the European proletariat "has never really"—I mean effectively—"opposed it." (My emphasis, R.D). The very fact that Senghor must himself interpret "really" as "effectively" shows an awareness of proletarian struggles and revolutions. It is certainly too easy today to use that as an excuse to appeal not to the proletariat of advanced countries, but to the authorities. It is certainly too high a price to pay when it entails an apology for de Gaulle who is exploiting not only the white proletariat but the North African (Algerian) revolutionaries. The very fact that on all the concrete questions relating to Africa's relationship to de Gaulle's France, Senghor has had to appear as an apologist for de Gaulle, discloses the tragedy of the underdeveloped countries fighting for freedom in an automated nuclear age.
On the other hand, Sekou Touré of Guinea, where the people had dared to say "No" to remaining part of the French Community, is much bolder in his concepts.

"In the realm of thought, man can claim to be the brain of the world, but on the concrete level of real life, where any occurrence will affect both the physical and spiritual being, the world is always the brain of man. Because it is in the world that all the thinking forces can be found, the dynamic forces of development and perfection, it is true that the fusion of energy takes place and where the true quantity of the intellectual capacity of man can be found. So who could claim to exclude any one school of thought, any one kind of thought, or any one human family without by so doing excluding himself to some extent from the total society of men?...

"The science resulting from all human knowledge has no nationality. The ridiculous disputes about the origin of such and such a discovery do not interest us since they add nothing to the value of the discovery. It can therefore be said that African unity offers the world a new humanism essentially founded on the universal solidarity and co-operation between people without any racial and cultural antagonism and without narrow egotism and privilege. This is above and beyond the problem of West Africa and so far removed from the quarrels which divide the highly developed countries as are the conditions and aspirations of the African people."

We cannot know in which direction these African leaders will turn in the critical 1960's. We do know that their serious concern with the theoretical foundations for the building of a new society has no parallel in the intellectual leaders of the West. Our epoch is a "birth-time of history" and the contributions of the Africans to thought as well as to revolutions is an integral part of the reconstruction of society on new beginnings.

The Stream Beneath The Straws

From time to time a book appears that alters human experience by making explicit the possibilities of new relationships. When thought and deed have come to a standoff such a book makes it possible for them to move again—along untried ways.

It may be that a book of this order has recently been published in America, Marxism and Freedom by Raya Dunayevskaya (Beacon Associates—Six dollars or 34/-. It may soon be published in this country.

Is this? Much of the intractability of the present situation stems from the fact that little or no original political thinking has been done since the early 1920s. This means that although immense changes have taken place in science, technology and economics there is nothing to match them in political ideas and forms. (What have we but the New Deal and John Maynard Keynes?) Thus humanity today has all the parts with which to build a new world but no idea how to set about it.

Early socialist ideas were based, or thought to be based, on the concept of socialist internationalism. In the event of war the workers of the world were to stand together, overthrow their capitalist governments, join hands across frontiers and build socialism. The dream was shattered by the total collapse of the Second International in 1914.

When Lenin heard the news of the collapse he was frankly incredulous: "When it proved to be true, the theoretical ground on which he stood, and which he thought so impregnable, gave way under him." He then did a very strange thing. Instead of throwing himself into the fray to recrude the international he retired from the political scene to re-examine his whole philosophy. "He began reading Hegel's Science of Logic. It formed the great philosophical foundation of the great divide in Marxism." After weeks of study he came up with this startling conclusion: "It is impossible completely to grasp Marx's Capital, and especially the first chapter, if you have not studied through and understood the whole of Hegel's Logic. Consequently, none of the Marxists for the past half a century have understood Marx!"

It is difficult to begin to convey in a few words just what this means. Modern thinking has been vitiated by the assumed separate oppositeness of the subjective and objective. It was this that Hegel destroyed. Lenin in 1914 (for the first time) grasped the significance of Hegel’s discovery.

Dynamic qualities are in things and in persons—not merely operating upon them. Energy, atomic or human, does not require to be controlled, organised, “mastered.” It requires rather to be discovered, understood, made free. When it is free it is creativity itself and its own justification.

Thus human society can be self-activating and self-correcting and this makes any sort of government (the rule of men over men) ultimately absurd. This is the kernel of dialectics. Today _homo sapiens_ is afraid of himself because of ignorance of the character of movement within himself. Straw men are preferred to the stream. Lenin, seeing this for the first time and thus being free had no option but to make history. This he did, and the fact that others did not if for him was not his fault. He was much too alone, far too far ahead. We have still to catch up with him and Dunayevskaya has located the trail.
