Industrialists Face New Crisis in Britain

The DAILY WORKER

NEW YORK, Oct. 12.—The arrival of 3,000 American cotton workers on the docks in London to-day has been hailed as a "giant step" in the struggle for recognition of Labor rights in the United States.

The workers, who are members of the American textile union, are expected to remain in London for a week, and will be employed in the manufacture of cloth for export to the United States.

The cotton workers, who are employed in the textile industry in the southern states, are answering the call to arms of the American textile union, which has announced a strike to protest against the low wages and long hours paid to American textile workers.

The strike is expected to last for several months, and will involve the closure of many textile mills.

The American textile union has already made arrangements for the accommodation of the strikers, and has provided them with food, clothing, and medical care.

In commenting on the strike, the union said: "We are fighting for the right of American textile workers to earn a living wage and to work in conditions that are safe and healthy."

The strike is also a protest against the practice of American textile companies of paying low wages to their workers, and of using child labor.

The strike is expected to be a major factor in the election campaign next year, and will be watched closely by the labor leaders in the United States.
