The BIG FOUR CONFERENCE

THE BIG FOUR CONFERENCE

By WILLIAM Z. FOSTER

The recent Big Four conference that was held in Potsdam, Germany, marked a new stage in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.

The Big Four conference was a turning point in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.

The Big Four conference was a turning point in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.

The Big Four conference was a turning point in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.

The Big Four conference was a turning point in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.

The Big Four conference was a turning point in the history of international relations. The four great powers—Britain, the United States, the Soviet Union, and China—agreed to form an alliance against Germany and its allies. This was a significant development, as it represented a new strategy for the Big Four to work together against the fascist regimes in Europe.