Eisenhower's Message

By William Z. Foster

The American people are becoming increasingly alarmed at the threat of a developing economic crisis in this country and throughout the capitalist world. In his State of the Union address to Congress, President Eisenhower warned that a major recession could be averted only by a major economic recovery.

In this context, labor unions are in a unique position to play a crucial role in the fight against recession. They have the power to mobilize workers to fight against the forces of the capitalist class and to demand a recovery of the economy.

Trade Unions Need A Mutual Aid Pact

By GEORGE MORRIS

The CORPORATIONS is America are working up steam for a 1920-type open shop drive, and they are greatly encouraged by their first major success in the recent seven-week North American Airlines Strike. The chief industry spokesman, the magazine Business Week, is genuinely worried about the possibility of a national railroad strike. Another example cited by the magazine is the "bargaining trend in the strike of 1,000 Hat Corporation of America workers in the 28th week of the strike in Newark, Conn., to stop the firm from moving departments to Tennessee and another area offering refuge from union pressure." The same strike, the magazine says, is "economically feasible to do so."

Drawing the line of battle

"There are typically the two demands that seem to be coming up with different industries," IGOH NYC. He observes that these demands are frequently for management. One is an increase in wages, and the other is to run his business without union interference. The second is a demand for an end—or a weakening—of the union shop. The magazine says that in recent years many employers have been ordering their workers to sign a "model contract" that they 'could not do otherwise,' in order to avoid a strike. But they have "never again taken their time for a fight." IGOH NYC. cites as an illustration of the importance of these demands the recent strike in the hat industry in New York City. The strike was put down with the help of the police and the courts. The workers were stopped from moving departments to Tennessee and another area offering refuge from union pressure. The same strike, the magazine says, is "economically feasible to do so."

ILA Plans Reorganization

A PLAN to reorganize the International Longshoremen's Association, caught in a grip of jurisdictional battle with the AFL and charged by both AFL and the regional office of NLRB with "violence and intimidation" in last month's NLRB vote, was called to order at the ILA Allied Trades Council on Wednesday night.

The plan, according to sources close to ILA President William V. Bradley, would consolidate many of the smaller unions into a single, more powerful organization. The plan was described by one union president as the "natural step" in the development of the ILA.

"Why I Am Going To Work Party"

ABNER W. BERRY

Some men asked me the other day why I was going to attend the 50th anniversary celebration of the Daily Worker in Chicago. The answer is easy. I am going to attend the celebration because it is one birthday that really matters. It is the birthday of this newspaper and the workers and farmers who always dug a little deeper to keep the infant alive.

I WANT to see more life Joe Hill. While working for the ILA, I was on trial in Chicago and I was convicted. I was sent to jail and I now have a federal indictment against me. I have been in jail for more than one year and I am now facing a federal indictment against me. I have been in jail for more than one year and I am now facing a federal indictment against me.

Bradley began his presentation stating that the ILA had turned its attention to the issue of workers' rights and was determined to fight for them. He said that the ILA had a responsibility to the working class and that it would not be able to do its job if it did not stand up for workers' rights.

"They Can't Run Out When You Sit Down"

By ELIHU S. HICKS

"WHAT are you going to do when the bosses turn off the union newspapers and leave you behind?" asked Hicks. The answer, he said, is for workers to organize and fight back. Hicks said that the AFL-CP had seen a "harvest of victories" and that the ILA was "on the move." Hicks called for a "united front" to fight for the rights of workers.

The union began negotiating with the company, he said, and it was "with great relief" that the union was able to get back to work after a long strike. "Our members," he said, "are the heroes of this country." Hicks called for a "revolt of the workers" and said that the union would fight for the rights of workers.

"On Wednesday, after receiving a letter from Local 475, the company went into the Brooklyn Supreme Court to get an injunction against the workers. Pursuing a hearing on the injunction, the company sought a delay of the following day. Supreme Court Justice Gary argued a conference with company and union representatives.

As a result of the conference, Justice Brown recommended that the company and the workers' representatives meet to discuss the matter. The company agreed to meet with the workers' representatives to discuss the matter.

Faced with the workers' determination to press their case, the company was forced to agree to meet with the workers' representatives to discuss the matter. The company agreed to meet with the workers' representatives to discuss the matter.
