NAACP Youths Urge Fight on Bias

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6 - Segregation, like slavery, is illegal in this country today, and "it must be waged by the 19th century Abolitionists," said Henry "Fought slavery, Dr. Channing Tuttle, a leader in a prepared speech for the closing main meeting of the NAACP's legislative conference.

The resolution of the NAACP board chairman punctuated a four-day conference of some 200 youth groups and student associations of 30 states. Their meeting was characterized by a militant insistence upon the end of innover and segregation and the advancement of world peace.

Dr. Tuttle said the youth ought to develop programs to meet the responsibilities which rest with your generation.

The tone of the speech reflected but did not match the spirit of the conference, judging from the documents it produced, as shown to this reporter by various delegates.

These documents, together with interviews with a number of delegates, reflect their determination to change the perspectives and the spirit of the Negro and white youth in attendance.

At last night's meeting representatives of the NAACP Youth Council, and the National Committee for the Equal Rights of Negro Youth, made a joint report on the conference, and emphasized the need for the development of a new, more militant spirit in youth groups.

The conference resolved to carry out the recommendations of the NAACP's legislative program for the 81st Congress, including the cease-fire in all forms of segregation, the reversal of the Supreme Court decision in the case of Brown v. Board of Education, and the passage of civil rights laws at the earliest possible date.

The conference also called for a national youth movement, with the aim of mobilizing all young people in the fight for civil rights and against segregation.

The conference concluded with a march and rally in which thousands of youth participated, expressing their determination to continue the struggle for civil rights and against segregation.
