Workers’ Center in Union Square

One of the events in the life of the working class of New York will take place when the Communist Party of the New York, the Workers’ Center in Union Square, opens its doors.

The center will provide better quarters for the district offices of the Workers’ Community Party, for the Workers’ Educational Committee and for the Workers’ College of the Communist Party.

The center will also provide a place for the workers to meet, to discuss their problems, and to organize for the struggle for the betterment of their lives.

Greater opportunities will be accorded to The DAILY WORKER and Workers’ World, which are published in the building.

The center will be a place of education and culture, where the workers can learn about their rights and duties, and where they can develop their own ideas and plans for the future.

The center will also be a place of recreation, where the workers can relax and enjoy themselves after a hard day’s work.

The center will be a place of unity, where the workers of all races and backgrounds can come together and work for a common goal.

The center will be a place of progress, where the workers can learn about new ideas and new methods of work, and where they can apply these ideas and methods to their own lives.

The center will be a place of freedom, where the workers can speak out and express their own thoughts and feelings, and where they can continue to work for a world without exploitation, without oppression, and without class division.

The center will be a place of action, where the workers can organize and take action to make the world a better place for all.

The center will be a place of hope, where the workers can find inspiration and courage to continue their fight for justice and freedom.

The center will be a place of friendship, where the workers can make friends and build solidarity across all boundaries.

The center will be a place of love, where the workers can find love and support and experience the joy of acting together.

The center will be a place of diversity, where the workers can learn about each other and about the world, and where they can respect and celebrate their differences.

The center will be a place of community, where the workers can build a strong and powerful base of solidarity and unity.

The center will be a place of revolution, where the workers can continue to fight for the ultimate goal of a world without exploitation, without oppression, and without class division.
