The Stalinist Crisis: Poland
In Warsaw the Turn Is Deeper

Stalin was shot on January 27. The news sent shock waves through the Warsaw elite. The day after Stalin's death, the new leader of the Polish Communist Party, Władysław Gomułka, announced that Stalin's policies were to be reversed. The Polish government declared a three-day mourning period and closed its borders with the Soviet Union. The Polish economy was brought to a standstill as workers went on strike to protest against Stalin's legacy.

The reaction to Stalin's death was not uniform. Some波兰ian workers welcomed the change, while others were deeply concerned about the future of their country. The Polish government announced that it would continue to support the Soviet Union in any conflict with the West. However, many Poles were skeptical of this policy and feared that Poland was becoming too dependent on Moscow.

The economic situation in Poland was also worsening. The Polish economy had been devastated by the Second World War, and Stalin's policies had only made matters worse. The new government promised to reverse these policies, but it was unclear how successful they would be. The Polish government faced many challenges, including a shortage of food and fuel, a faltering economy, and a population that was growing restive.

Despite these challenges, the new government appeared to be making some headway. The Polish government announced plans to restore the independence of Poland, and it began to take steps to rebuild the country. The Polish people were hopeful that their country would soon be able to stand on its own two feet again.

But the future of Poland was uncertain. The country was still divided between those who wanted to remain part of the Soviet Union and those who wanted to be independent. The Polish government faced many challenges, and it was unclear how successful they would be in achieving its goals. The Polish people were divided, and it was unclear whether they would be able to come together to support the new government.

Despite these challenges, the Polish people were hopeful that their country would soon be able to stand on its own two feet again. The Polish government faced many challenges, and it was unclear how successful they would be in achieving its goals. The Polish people were divided, and it was unclear whether they would be able to come together to support the new government.

The Polish government faced many challenges, and it was unclear how successful they would be in achieving its goals. The Polish people were divided, and it was unclear whether they would be able to come together to support the new government.