October 21, 1957

Labor Right Wing Wins Victory

By OWEN ROBERTS

London, October 11

Only a few days have passed since the British Labor Party conference ended at Brighton, insufficient time in which to make any definite conclusions about the influence of the controversy over the defense policy. But sharply the major issues were clearly the important features which are now the subject of much debate and discussion in political circles.

The fact that a stonger voice from Brighton was that the Labor Party is one hundred per cent confident that it is going to sweep back to power, and that the right-wing elements are in no position to take control of the party. The conference was dominated by the debate on the defense policy, and the final vote was a resounding victory for the left-wing. This was due in large part to the strong leadership of the left-wing elements, who played a key role in the conference deliberations.

One of the main achievements of the conference was the acceptance of the left-wing view on the defense policy. The left-wing argument was that the country needs a strong, independent defense policy, and that this can only be achieved by a strong, independent Labor Party.

The left-wing elements were also able to achieve a number of other important victories. They were able to secure a number of concessions from the Labor Party's leaders, including a commitment to a more active role for the labor movement in the fight against imperialism.

In conclusion, the conference was a clear victory for the left-wing. The left-wing elements were able to assert their views and achieve a number of important victories. The Labor Party is now better equipped to fight against the threats facing the country.

ISSUE NOT SETTLED

However, the final vote was not the end of the debate. The issue of defense policy remains unresolved, and the left-wing is determined to continue to fight for a strong, independent defense policy.

The Labor Party is now faced with the difficult task of implementing the decisions made at the conference. The left-wing is determined to ensure that these decisions are carried out in a way that will benefit the working class and the poor.

The left-wing is also determined to continue to fight for a variety of other issues, including the rights of workers, the fight against imperialism, and the need for social justice.

In conclusion, the conference was a clear victory for the left-wing. The left-wing elements were able to assert their views and achieve a number of important victories. The Labor Party is now better equipped to fight against the threats facing the country.