Baraka Abandons 'Racism' as Ineffective And Shifts to 'Scientific Socialism' of Marx

JOSEPH F. SULLIVAN

NAWC, Dec. 27—Mf the new era in the black community have been the overthrow of the former colonial regime and the establishment of a new political order. This has been accompanied by a growing sense of nationalism and a desire for self-determination. And there is a growing awareness that the economic and political problems of the black community can only be addressed through collective action. This has led to a renewed interest in the ideas of Malcolm X, who has emerged as a leading voice for the black community. His call for self-determination and his rejection of the idea of a black savior have resonated with many members of the black community. The current leadership of the NAWC has been influenced by Malcolm X's ideas, and this has led to a shift away from the earlier emphasis on the role of the black community in the struggle for freedom. This shift has been accompanied by a growing interest in the ideas of Karl Marx and the concept of scientific socialism. The NAWC leadership believes that the black community must embrace the ideas of scientific socialism if it is to overcome its economic and political problems.
