Communists Resist Anti-busing Fascists at Louisville Factory

As the resistance movement grows in Louisville against the anti-busing movement, the solidarity of the workers and the defense of the black workers at the Louisville Mill is of great importance. The workers at the Louisville Mill have been defending their right to organize and to resist the fascist attack. The workers have been organizing and distributing literature among the workers, and they have been taking part in the marches and demonstrations against the fascist attack. The workers at the Louisville Mill have been fighting against the fascist attack in a variety of ways. They have been organizing picket lines, distributing literature, and holding meetings to discuss the situation. The workers have also been working to organize the workers at other mills in the area, and they have been lobbying for support from community organizations.

In the past week, several hundred workers have participated in the anti-busing protest. The workers have organized a picket line at the front gate of the mill, and they have been distributing literature among the workers. The workers have also been organizing meetings to discuss the situation and to plan for future actions. The workers at the Louisville Mill have been working hard to defend their right to organize and to resist the fascist attack. They have been fighting for their rights and for the rights of all workers in the area. They have been showing the world that the workers can stand up to the fascist attack and that they will not be intimidated.

The workers at the Louisville Mill have been fighting against the fascist attack in a variety of ways. They have been organizing picket lines, distributing literature, and holding meetings to discuss the situation. The workers have also been working to organize the workers at other mills in the area, and they have been lobbying for support from community organizations. The workers at the Louisville Mill have been showing the world that the workers can stand up to the fascist attack and that they will not be intimidated.