There is not an ounce of anti-revisionism in the inter-imperialist rivalry between Beijing and Moscow.

According to a recent U.S. imperialist news report from Beijing, the Chinese leaders are preparing for the new anti-revisionist Soviet Union should it take place in the U.S. imperialist world. This report is based on the recognition of the increasing anti-revisionist posture of Moscow.

Today, the revisionist doctrine of Beijing is being propagated widely in the media, under the slogan of a struggle against the so-called "anti-revisionist" policies of Moscow. To achieve this goal, the Chinese leaders are accusing Moscow of being revisionist.

Recent developments in China have been interpreted as evidence of a growing rift between Beijing and Moscow. The Chinese have been critical of Moscow's policies, particularly in the area of international relations.

Similar developments have occurred in the previous years, with the Chinese leaders accusing Moscow of being revisionist. However, in recent months, the Chinese leaders have been even more critical of Moscow, accusing it of being revisionist in its policies towards the Third World and in its stance on the question of reunification of China.

The Chinese leaders have been particularly critical of Moscow's policies towards the Third World, which they see as being anti-Chinese. They have accused Moscow of being anti-Chinese in its policies towards the African and Asian countries, which they see as being anti-Chinese.
