The First National Conference of the Marxist-Leninist Party of the USA was held in summer 1981. It was a significant event that marked a new phase in the development of the revolutionary movement in the United States.

The conference was attended by hundreds of delegates from various regions across the country. The agenda covered a wide range of topics, including the analysis of the current political situation, the role of the Party in the struggle against imperialism and reaction, and the need for solidarity with the struggles of the working class worldwide.

The conference was chaired by a central committee, which was elected at the end of the previous congress. The central committee was responsible for overseeing the work of the party and making decisions on strategic matters.

The conference was attended by a large number of delegates, who participated in lively discussions and debates. The atmosphere was one of unity and solidarity, as the delegates worked together to plan the future course of the party.

The conference was a major milestone in the development of the Marxist-Leninist movement in the United States. It laid the foundations for the party's work in the coming years and provided a clear vision of the goals and objectives that the party would pursue in the struggle against imperialism and reaction.
Militant Solidarity with the Marxist-Leninist Movements throughout the World

The First National Conference of the Marxist-Leninist Party (MLP) designated the MLP as the Marxist-Leninist communist movement. It also designated the MLP’s new programmatic line and its international practice.
