LABOR ACTION
FOR A GOVERNMENT OF LABOR, NOT OF STRIKEBREAKERS!

JERRY TROGD

CHICAGO, May 26—Conflicted by unprevented demands to be replaced by the Secretary of Army for strikebreakers, and subordinated by hopes of eight other railroad unions, President A. P. Whitney of the United laborers' locomotive and firemen's union today ordered the union-wide rice strike shortly before 5 p.m. Sat- urday. President Truman, who took the lead in breaking the strike, a few minutes later went before Congress to apologize for provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which, in effect, would authorize the use of the National Guard to suppress the railroad strike.

President Truman, who ordered the strike to be broken, a few minutes later went before Congress to apologize for the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which, in effect, would authorize the use of the National Guard to suppress the railroad strike. This was the first time in history that the National Guard had been called into its own state, and it was the third time in the history of the United States that the National Guard had been called into service by the federal government.

In his address to Congress, President Truman said: "I have been called upon to make a difficult decision. I have been called upon to break the strike. I have been called upon to do what I believe is necessary to preserve the peace and stability of the nation. I have been called upon to do what I believe is necessary to protect the rights of labor and the rights of management. I have been called upon to do what I believe is necessary to preserve the democratic institutions of this country."

The strike, which began on May 26, was the largest in the history of the United States. It involved more than 1 million workers in 11 states and lasted for 11 days. It was the result of a dispute over wages, hours, and working conditions, and it was a major test of the Taft-Hartley law, which had been passed by Congress in 1947. The law gave the President the power to call in the National Guard to break strikes that threatened the national defense.

The strike was called by the United Mine Workers of America (UMWA), which represents coal miners, and by the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), which represents many of the nation's major labor unions.

The strike was broken by the United States Army, which was called in by President Truman. The Army used troops to break the strike and to keep the peace, and it was estimated that the cost of the strike was over $1 billion.

Throughout the strike, President Truman and his administration faced intense criticism from both labor and business leaders. Labor leaders called the strike a necessary action to protect the rights of workers, while business leaders accused the President of using government power to suppress labor.

The strike came to an end on June 1, 1948, when President Truman signed a bill into law that gave workers the right to organize and to bargain collectively, and that prohibited the creation of a national strike fund. The law also made it illegal to use government power to suppress labor.

Editor:

I am a school pupil with the WP. I am a little bit different in the midst of my school. I have had so many discussions within the two parties. Personally, I do not think a lot. I am not a good person. I can be unimportant to solve the situation. But I am in the minority. I have heard the party leaders of the WP. I am in the minority. I am not in the minority. I am a minority within my own school. This is the minority of the WP.]

Of Special Interest to Women

By Susan Green

The women's movement is facing new challenges and opportunities. The movement is no longer just about fighting for the vote. It is also about fighting for economic justice, ending violence against women, and creating a more equitable society. The movement is diverse and includes women of all ages, races, and backgrounds. We must come together to build a stronger movement for social justice.
