Revolutionary Youth Meet in International Conference at Luxembourg

The Furriers’ Problem

It is my nature to respect the situations in the fur trade, reported by a correspondent in last week’s issue, and to respect the workers in the fur trade and their general union organizations. Every year, the international fur trade reaches a peak and new standards are set for the next season. The fur trade is a major factor in the economics of many countries, and the well-being of the workers is a matter of great concern to union and labor leaders around the world. The International Fur Merchant’s Union (IFM) and the International Fur Workers’ Union (IFWU) are the two major trade associations in the fur industry. The IFM represents the merchants, while the IFWU represents the workers. The IFM and the IFWU have a strong tradition of cooperation, and they work together to improve working conditions and wages for fur workers.

The IFM and the IFWU have been working on a new agreement for the fur trade, which will be signed in Luxembourg on Saturday, March 21st. This agreement is expected to be a major milestone in the fur trade, as it will set new standards for working conditions and wages for fur workers. The IFM and the IFWU are working closely with other labor organizations and trade unions around the world to ensure that the new agreement is fair and just for both the workers and the merchants.
