QUESTION BOX

Q: What is the basis for the split among the workers' parties in the international labor movement?

A: The split among the workers' parties in the international labor movement is based on differences in political orientation and strategy. Some parties support a revolutionary approach, advocating for the overthrow of capitalist systems through mass revolutionary actions. Others advocate for a more gradual, evolutionary approach, focusing on organizing workers and building trade unions to improve working conditions and wages. These differences often lead to ideological conflicts and splits within the movement.
