THE CHARLOTTE HOUSE AT CHERRY

BIRRIT miners, blackened and begrimed and sweating, were marching out of the ferry gate and through the mud to Cherry. Their eyes were half closed with the dust of the road and the heat of the day. The air was thick with the smell of tobacco and sweat. They were tired and dirty, but they were happy. They had won the strike, and that was all that mattered.

The strike had been long and hard. The company had refused to give in, and the miners had fought back with every weapon at their disposal. They had marched on the company, they had blockaded the mine, they had even tried to start a armed revolt. But the company had held its ground, and the miners had been forced to give in.

The company had promised to give the miners a raise, and the miners had accepted the offer. They knew that it was not enough, but it was a start. They would keep fighting, they would keep marching, until they got what they wanted. And they knew that they would win.

The strike had been a test of wills, a test of courage, and a test of strength. And the miners had come out on top. They had proved that they were not afraid of anything, and that they would not be defeated.

The company had been forced to give in, and the miners had won. The strike was over, and the miners could go home. They would go home to their families, and to their homes, and to their lives. They would go home and be happy, because they had won the right to be happy.

The strike had been a hard one, but it had been worth it. The miners had fought, and they had won. They had shown the world that they were not afraid, and that they would not be defeated. They had shown the world that they were strong, and that they were proud.

The miners would go home, and they would be happy. They would go home and be proud, because they had shown the world that they were not afraid, and that they would not be defeated. They would go home and be strong, because they had shown the world that they were not afraid, and that they would not be defeated.
