Beginning of Things

STEAMBOATING began to be developed in America in 1825 when several small wooden paddle boats were using the streams and rivers of the wilderness to transport supplies and passengers along that stream. The location of Pennsylvania gave her a great advantage in steamboatbuilding and by 1827, when she had completed her steamboats, was in a position to supply steamboats to the neighboring states and New Orleans. Soon the great steamboats were to be seen plying the waters on the Mississippi. By 1829, steamboating had reached New Orleans, and with that new city's growth, the transportation of passengers and goods was made easier. This was the beginning of steamboating as we know it today.

As Things May Be

Art and Literature Under Steamboating

In the early days of steamboating, the emphasis was on the story of the voyage, the scenery seen, and the people met. This was the beginning of the art of steamboating, and it has continued to the present day. The steamboats themselves were the focus of attention, and the art of steamboating was born. The steamboats were the means of transportation, and the art of steamboating was born out of necessity.

Little Stories of Real People

MAFEEY, a newspaper paragraphist, has written that there are two kinds of people. One kind is the person who writes, and the other is the person who reads. The former are the only people who are truly happy, for they are the only ones who can appreciate the beauty of the steamboats.

Failure of Capitalism

In America there are from fifteen to nineteen thousand small and large industries, all of which are supported by the labor of American workers. These industries are all supported by the labor of American workers, and their success is due to the labor and the industry of the people. The success, however, is only temporary, for the industries are dependent on the labor of the people. When the labor is taken away, the industries fail. This is the true meaning of capitalism, that it is only temporary, and that it will fail when the labor is taken away. The labor is the life of the industries, and without it, they are nothing.

Loving the Poor

We all love the poor. It would be noble to think of them, and to think of them in this world. They are the ones who are worth loving. They are the ones who are worth our respect. They are the ones who are worth our care. They are the ones who are worth our love. They are the ones who are worth our compassion. They are the ones who are worth our pity. They are the ones who are worth our humanity.
