The Appeal this week presents a partial showing of unemployment in the United States. The problem is incomparably difficult. President Wilson, while admitting that conditions are appalling everywhere, was not at all optimistic about the future. He suggested that the American people were ready to make sacrifices, but he warned them that this was only the beginning, and that more sacrifices would be necessary before full employment could be achieved.

There are now about three million workers in the United States who are unemployed. This number has increased considerably during the past few months, and the situation is likely to become worse before it improves. The government is doing what it can to alleviate the sufferings of the unemployed, but it is clear that more must be done if we are to avoid a serious social crisis.

The Appeal is much concerned with this question. We are not satisfied with the policy of the government, which we regard as too timid and inadequate. We believe that the government should take decisive action to restore full employment, and we are therefore calling upon the people to demand more vigorous measures. We are confident that, if the people are united and determined, we can succeed in achieving this objective.

The Appeal is a weekly newspaper published in Kansas City, Missouri. It was founded in 1914 and is owned and edited by Fred D. Warren. The paper is known for its radical and progressive stance, and it has been a leading voice in the campaign for social justice and economic equality.

The Appeal's coverage of the unemployment crisis is one of its most important features. The paper has been a strong advocate for the rights of the unemployed, and it has published numerous articles on the subject, written by leading figures in the labor movement.

We urge our readers to support the Appeal, and to help us in our fight for a better world. Together, we can make a difference.
