RUSSELL WILL BE FREE

English Walling, American Socialist, delivers message from Russia to American People.

President of the Russian Revolution, speaking through his representative, says in his message to the American Socialist, "The revolution is getting the guns. Although it opposes the largest of the czarist regime, it must not worry about the revolutionaries. The revolutionaries support the movement of June 17. The Bolsheviks, the most courageous and consistent workers, are coming up against the czarist regime. The revolution is getting the guns."

The revolution must not worry about the revolutionaries. The revolutionaries support the movement of June 17. The Bolsheviks, the most courageous and consistent workers, are coming up against the czarist regime. The revolution is getting the guns.

The Bolsheviks are now in control of the army, and more than one machine gun is being used against the czarist forces. The Bolsheviks are supported by the people, and more than one machine gun is being used against the czarist forces. The Bolsheviks are supported by the people.

The Support of the Throne in Russia

Two great facts stand out as distinguishing characteristics of the present Russian regime.

One is the unbroken perfection attained by the tool with which the work of the world is done. The other is the growing consciousness of power on the part of those who use it.

It is these two facts which make Socialism possible, say, certain.

The perpetuation of the tool, the invention of the machete, the organization of the mines, factories, with the consequent control over nature, makes possible the freedom of the whole race, by placing at the disposal of mankind a new and endless race of mechanical slaves.

The political organization of the world would then have been impossible. Laborers were not ready for it. Industry was not ready for it.

There was but little communication between members of the working class. The spoken word was almost the only means of conveying ideas.

The printing press was still in its infancy and the railway, telegraph, telephone, all were still in their infancy.

The loftiest ideals of the workers were still in the artistic state of the individual mind. There were no means by which they could be shared by others.

The class of laborers was not yet formed. There were thousands and thousands of little firms in each industry. The shop was not yet organized, as yet the elephant was not strong enough to tread on the toes of the speckled hound. Needy.

Psychologically, the condition of the workers was not yet ripe for the establishment of a world revolutionary party.

The world was still in its infancy, and the whole world's effort to make itself respectable was still virtual.

The structure of the factories was not yet completed. The workers were not yet able to hold the whole egg in their hands.

They were not yet able to imagine a life that was not in the workshop.

It was in this state of the world that it was necessary to conserve the present order of things and organize the men of the future.

The most profound respect for the past and for the work of the past is the only way of preserving the present.

Ruskin's Teaching

The man of this age should not be a forger, but he should be a master. A master of the past.

The aim of the work is to discover the principles of the past and make them the basis of the present work.

The laborer is the artist of the future. He is not the inventor, but the modified and well-drilled artisan of the past.

The most profound respect for the past and for the work of the past is the only way of preserving the present.
