THE PURLOINED LETTER
By EDGAR ALLAN POE

TILL supernatural culminating point was reached in the analysis of the argument which the friend of the author of "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" had so pithily described as "the sacramental inference." This was at a certain critical juncture in the progress of the history, when the rafter of the house was discovered to be hollow, and an octagonal object was found to be indelibly marked with the initials of Morgue. It was this, indeed, which marked the climax of the detective hypothesis. The probability of the supposition was hereby shewn to be 100 per cent, and the imagination was thereby set to work. "At last," said Dupin, in a low voice, "we possess a small but necessary fragment of the机关."

It will not be necessary, therefore, for me to enter into any further detail of the subsequent investigation. The scene was reconstructed, and the rafter was easily brought to light. It needed but a short and easy ascent to the floor of the garret, which was fastened with a lock. The key was in the lock, and the lock was open. An investigation of the rafter showed that it was but a small cavity, and that there was nothing in it but what was exposed to view. It was not the work of a man. It was the work of a boy.

"As for the boy," said Dupin, "he was obliged to go up and down the rafter, and look through it, in order to get at the object which he sought. It was a small box, and contained a bill of sale, and some other documents relating to the murder."

The box was opened, and the documents were found to be perfectly genuine. The names of the parties were such as one would not expect to find in a box of this description. The documents were written in a small hand, and were evidently of a private character. They seemed to be the property of a person who had been in the habit of writing in the garret. The box was opened, and the documents were found to be perfectly genuine. The names of the parties were such as one would not expect to find in a box of this description.
