OWNERSHIP vs. REGULATION

Every newspaper on the subject of monoply in these days declares that unless the trusts are regulated they must be governmentally owned.

This was the demand of Roosevelt's message. It has been rung out by every editorial in capitalist ideas and by almost nothing in the newspapers. But the results are not apparent. Some changes have been made here and there in the tariff, but nothing of the sort expected. The only law ever passed to regulate the trusts is a mere attempt at the Egyptian system of taxation, in which the trust is supposed to be a corporation, and then a tax is levied upon the corporation without any further inquiry as to what is produced or what is the character of the trust.

It is true that there is much talk of the trusts, but the talk is all on the subject of the trusts. The trusts are not being regulated, and the trusts are being increased.

This is a strange situation. It is as if the government were dead, and the trusts were running wild. It is as if the government were a corporation, and the trusts were the corporation.

It is a strange situation, and it is a strange condition of things. It is as if the government were a corporation, and the trusts were the corporation.
