ANOTHER STEPPING STONE TO CIVILIZATION

By Fred Halverston

The following is a reply to the proposal of the American Federation of Labor, made a few months ago, to abandon the use of strike as a means of political action.

"Precedent"

This is not the first time that the idea of using strike as a means of political action has been espoused. The present movement is not revolutionary, and there is no reason to believe that it will bring about any radical change in the political system. The idea of using strike as a means of political action is not new, and it has been used in various forms for many years. The American Federation of Labor, for example, has for many years used strike as a means of political action, and has achieved many successes. The use of strike as a means of political action is not only possible, but it is necessary. The movement for political reform is a long and difficult one, and will require the cooperation of all progressive elements. The use of strike as a means of political action is one of the most effective means of achieving this cooperation.

Karl Marx and the Economic Organization

At the General congress of the International Workmen's Association, which met in Chicago, the political economist Karl Marx looked upon the union movement. At that congress, 1893, the following resolution was adopted:

"The formation and support of associations on the industrial field must be the chief efforts of the working people at the present juncture. Instead of waiting for the necessary conditions to develop themselves, which they must count on covering all the economic necessities of each one, they must make an active and persevering effort to create the conditions of the industrial work- lage, political and social progress which are necessary for the workmen to be able to realize their purposes of revolutionizing industry and society, and to achieve the just division of the means of production and distribution.

"For this reason, 'Crematorium' in Milwaukee, Wis., to be the location of the Industrial Workers of the World was also known as "The Industrial Workers of the World." The IWW was a radical labor union that advocated for radical changes in society and supported the idea of a classless, anarchist society. The union was known for its anti-capitalist stance, its support for direct action, and its efforts to organize workers in various industries.
PREAMBLE OF THE I.W.W.

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. Their interests are diametrically opposed. The working class can have nothing to gain by the现存的state affairs. Their condition is the result of the existence of classes, and it will end with the abolition of the classes.

The rapid growth of wealth and the centering of the great bulk of wealth in the hands of a few, and the enormous power and influence which is thereby given to the employers, make the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power and influence of the employing class. The position is the same as that of the small farmers against the big landowners, the position of the small manufacturers against the big industrialists, the position of the small industrialists against the big industrialists, the position of the small industrialists against the big industrialists.

The working class has nothing to lose but its chains. They are free at last.

to seek out and arrange with each other. The constitution is the supreme law, and the executive, legislative, and judicial powers are vested in the General Assembly of the I.W.W., the national executive council, and the local unions, respectively.

The following resolutions are submitted to the delegates for their consideration, and will be the basis of the platform of the I.W.W.

RESOLUTIONS OF PROTEST

I. The Orange Industry of California, Arizona, and the Workers Therein.

By Harry S. Case, Financial Secretary, Local 194, San Francisco, Calif.

The Orange Industry of California is one of the most important industries of the state. The workers in this industry are employed in the packing and shipping of oranges. The industry is controlled by a few large companies, and the workers are paid very low wages. The following resolutions are submitted to the delegates for their consideration, and will be the basis of the platform of the I.W.W.
