The French Proletariat

Arthur Jerome Levine in his lecture on "The Social Organization of Industrial Labor" says: "The French proletariat has always played a leading role in the labor movement. It is the country where working conditions are the worst."

"This is the reason why labor has always been the crux of the French economy. It is the country where working conditions are the worst."

"Not only has France always played a leading role in the social movement, but it has always been on the forefront of major labor strikes."

"The presence of the French proletariat is not only in the factories and mills, but also in the streets and squares of Paris. It is the country where the struggle against the capitalist system is strongest."

"In short, the French proletariat is the heart of the French economy. It is the country where the struggle against the capitalist system is strongest."

"And the United States Workers of America are the only ones who can match the heart of the French proletariat."

Labor Notes from the Field

Buck Company at Peace With Labor

Long and bitter War Ends

The Buck Company of Milwaukee, Wis., has ended its bitter strike with the Hardware Union of America, the result being the first labor-management agreement in the state of Wisconsin.

The seven-month strike was settled by the outbreak of World War I, which brought a cessation of production for the duration of the war.

The strike was settled by mutual agreement, the company agreeing to pay its employees the prevailing wage and to enter into a contract with the union for the duration of the peace.

The contract provides for the company to pay its employees a wage of $1.25 per hour, and for the company to agree to the hiring of new workers at the same rate.

The union agreed to the hiring of new workers at the same rate, and the company agreed to the hiring of new workers at the same rate.

The settlement of the strike marked the end of a bitter struggle between labor and management, and the workers were grateful for the settlement.
