What is the price of justice this week, Mr. Wayne Magnell?

Clement R. Wood, social worker of Birmingham, Ala., has been sued from his position because he refused to railroad strikers and their families to work in factories where they would be paid less than a dollar a day.

In the area where he lives, the strike has been called off, but he is firmly opposed to its continuation.

"I am a social worker," he said, "and I believe that the strike is wrong. I will not work in factories where workers are being kept at subsistence wages."
WAGES, PRICES, COMMODITIES AND TRADE

(John James)

In view of the fact that the Bruges Gild Resolution is being submitted in the name of the shop women, the question of women’s wages has taken on an added importance. In our class, the question is not merely one of how much money a worker is making, but also of how much he is getting out of his work. The wages of the shop women vary from one place to another, but in the majority of cases they are well below the minimum standard set by law. The workers themselves have little power to change the situation, as they are under the control of their employers. The situation is further complicated by the fact that the employers are not always able to provide the necessary facilities for their workers, such as proper housing and medical care.

However, the workers have managed to gain some concessions through collective bargaining. The worker who is willing to make a stand for his rights and who is prepared to fight for them will be able to improve his situation.

It is important to note that the wages of the shop women are not only a matter of personal concern, but also a reflection of the general economic situation. The workers themselves, as a result of their struggle, have been able to improve their living conditions, and this has had a positive effect on the economy of the area. The workers have been able to take the initiative in their own affairs, and this has given them a greater sense of self-confidence.

The workers who have been able to improve their situation have been able to help others in their community, and this has had a positive effect on the economy of the area. The workers have been able to take the initiative in their own affairs, and this has given them a greater sense of self-confidence.
