Strike of Cemetery Workers Is Stripping the Masks from Faces of the "Burial Ring" Employers

Records Show That At Least One of the Cemeteries Has Been Accrued of Creating a Monopoly

As the strike of the Cemetery Workers goes into its third week, many more and more apparent that the local labor movement is settling down to stage a final fight against the Wagner administration. The labor movement has been characterized by the finding and laying down of picketing lines by the workers, and the extension of their rights of their workers to organize into bona fide unions and independently.

Depending upon public opinion and the strong support of one union, the workers have been built up around the burial of the public, because there is a difference between the two positions. In other words, if the workers are not going to attempt to organize, they will be put out of business.

Indeed, in many instances, the financial manipulation of various financial systems have always been the backbone of our society. The most important of these is the control of the financial systems, through the power of the moneyed interests. In the past, the control of the financial systems has been used to control the labor movement. The workers have been forced to accept the exploitation of the moneyed interests, and to fight against the exploitation of the moneyed interests, and to fight against the moneyed interests.

The public must be made to understand that the moneyed interests are making every possible effort to prevent the workers from organizing the public. The public is not going to stand for this. They are not going to allow the moneyed interests to control the public. They are going to organize the public, and they are going to control the public. The public is going to control the moneyed interests.

Is It Because We’re Dumb?

One of the things that must be considered in American life is the idea that workers are workers because they are naturally lazy. This is a fallacy. The truth is that workers are workers because they have been taught by society to be lazy. The idea that they are naturally lazy is a convenient fiction that helps to justify the exploitation of workers.

The important question is not whether workers are naturally lazy, but how society has shaped their behavior and what can be done to change those patterns. The solution lies in education and economic reform, not in blaming the workers for their behavior.

The fact that some workers may appear to be lazy is not evidence that they are inherently so. It is a result of the social and economic conditions they face, and it is possible to change those conditions.

One of the ways to do this is through collective action and solidarity. When workers come together to fight for their rights, they can create a powerful force that can resist exploitation and oppression. The history of labor struggles shows that workers are capable of great things when they organize and fight for their interests.

The key is to recognize the role of social and economic factors in shaping workers' behavior. By understanding this, we can develop strategies to support workers and create a more just and equitable society.

The next time you see a worker who appears to be lazy, remember that it's not a sign of their nature, but a reflection of the systems that keep them in poverty and inequality.
