NCDDC Progress Shown at Duluth

Labor Called to Aid Tom Mooney
San Francisco, Calif.—In a report published in today's edition of the San Francisco Daily News, a leading labor leader is sounding the alarm this week that the labor movement is in serious danger of being crushed. According to recent surveys conducted by the National Labor Union, the labor movement is at its lowest ebb in recent years.

The report states that the labor movement is facing a crisis of confidence, and that the workers are losing faith in the ability of the union leadership to protect their interests. The report also notes that the labor movement is being undermined by the growing influence of the right-wing elements in the labor movement.

Race and the Worker

Maintained to be divided different races according to strength, might and skill. Each group was always different by itself. These divisions are not different by right of birth or by the color of their skin. They are different by the economic and social position of the group within society. The economic position of the group is the result of their ability to produce wealth, and the social position of the group is the result of their ability to secure and preserve wealth.

In conclusion, it is necessary to recognize that the color line is a social phenomenon, not a natural phenomenon.

Auto Mechanics Impelled by 1934 Strikes, Aided by 574

Present Needs of Machinists Are Internal Democracy and Capable Union Leadership

Continuing its battle against the work stoppages, the unions, we shall deal in this issue with the story of the development of the automotive machinists, Auto Mechanics Local No. 574, Iron Workers Local No. 1213, and Local 677 of Hogkins.

The Auto Mechanics Local 574 received its charter in 1927, when its membership was in the process of movement to Minneapolis as well as throughout the United States. At its nadir, the margin of survival for the auto mechanics was already secured by the dominant position of the General Motors Union, the Union of General Motors, and the Amalgamated Auto Workers Union. The threat of a strike was imminent.

On November 14, 1934, an election was held to determine the right of Union of General Motors Workers Local 677 and Hogkins' Local 574 to work at the Central Motor Car Company in St. Paul, to represent the auto mechanics in the event of an attempted strike. The election was lost by a margin of 1,000 to 3,000.

The vote was taken at the time the auto mechanics were in the process of moving to Minneapolis, with very little sympathy for the strike.

Nevertheless, the rank and file of the local mechanics, with a complete lack of support from the rest of the union, voted against the strike. On January 16 the Auto Mechanics Local No. 574 of St. Paul, Minnesota, a union which had little support, won an election to work at the Central Motor Car Company in Minneapolis, at which a band of auto mechanics won the vote by a margin of 15. The reason of the success of the union was the support of the auto mechanics of Minneapolis. The union was able to hold on to the job of the auto mechanics.

On the crucial day of the strike, when the bosses threatened a return to work, Henry L. and John B. were among the last to wear the uniform of the strikers. Henry L. was in the midst of the struggle for survival in a city where, as he said, "we shall not fail until the workers are victorious." The strike was resolved by the workers' determination and the bosses' capitulation.

The Right to Work

It is almost a truism that an employer has the right to expect from an employee a dedication to the rights of the working class. Far from defending such rights, employers have, in the United States, continually violated those of their workers. And that's why the struggle for those rights is not just a struggle for the political rights of labor, but also a struggle for the rights of the working class as a whole.
