Imperialism and the Worker By Tex Norris

I. IMPERIALISM.

An important development in recent years has been the growing consciousness of workers in many countries about the nature of imperialism. The term "imperialism" refers to the system of exploitation by which one country exercises control over another. In this period of economic crisis, imperialism is becoming more evident than ever before. The capitalists in the imperialist countries are using their power to maintain their统治 over the working class in other countries.

II. THE WORKER.

The worker in an imperialist country is faced with the dual burden of supporting the parasitic class that runs the country and the capitalist class that controls the means of production. The worker must struggle against the capitalist class to secure better wages, working conditions, and political rights.

III. THE STRUGGLE.

The struggle against imperialism is a key factor in the development of the working class. The capitalists in an imperialist country use their power to maintain the exploitation of the working class in other countries. The workers in an imperialist country must struggle against the capitalist class to secure better wages, working conditions, and political rights.
