California Congressman Protests Persecution Of Minneapolis WPA’ers

When even a congressman can’t stomach the assault of the federal government on the rights of Minnesotans, that is news! Yet in November 1939, Representative Edward H. Geyer, Democrat of California, wrote to the House of Representatives to protest the persecution of the local WPA workers. Geyer said, "I protest to the Congress...I protest to the Administration...I protest to the President..." then went on to say that the government was "making an end run attack on the labor movement," and that "the whole country may soon be faced with a situation wherein there is no floor of Congress who refuse to come down...and...our civil liberties go unchallenged." Geyer said.

The California salon started his talk by saying he believed the members of the House "should know what is going on in Minneapolis, Minnesota, a law recently passed by this body being used in an attempt to destroy the civil rights of labor, to persecute Americans, and to further still, the political advantage of certain individuals and groups." Geyer said. The new law, he noted, would "stress WPA strike and the present mass trials of 145 defendants charged with criminal conspiracy as a result of participating in that strike." Geyer then briefly listed the details of the strike, known to workers throughout the nation, that the strike was a spontaneous protest against the new law, that it was the only way Mississippi could "see" We left the city for the last time at 4:30 this P.M. By 10:30 this evening, we were nearing the border. We had a good run, but we started late and were a little on the short side. We crossed the line at around 10:30, and were on our way back to the city. The next day was the same, and we were back in the city by late afternoon. The train was scheduled to leave at 3:00, and we were on our way home.

History of Dispute Over Beer Drivers Recited by Tobin

In lengthy speech to recent AFL Convention, President of International Brotherhood of Teamsters Reports on Long-Struggling Brewery Drivers

President of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, both the AFL and the CIO, made a long speech at the AFL convention this week, reciting the history of the dispute between the AFL and the Teamsters over the management of the brewery drivers.

In the speech, President Tobin outlined the history of the dispute, starting from the early 1930s, when the Teamsters first became involved in the brewery industry. He described how the Teamsters had long been in conflict with the American Federation of Labor (AFL) over the management of the brewery drivers.

In the 1930s, the AFL was the dominant union in the country, and the Teamsters were trying to gain recognition in the brewery industry. The AFL, however, was determined to maintain its control over the industry, and the Teamsters were forced to fight for recognition.

In the 1940s, the Teamsters made some progress, but the AFL continued to try to prevent the Teamsters from gaining recognition. In the 1950s, the Teamsters made further advances, but the AFL was still determined to keep them out.

In the 1960s, the AFL’s efforts to prevent the Teamsters from gaining recognition began to falter. The Teamsters were able to gain recognition in some areas, and the AFL was forced to recognize their authority.

In the 1970s, the AFL began to make concessions to the Teamsters, and the two unions began to work together to resolve the dispute.

In the 1980s, the AFL and the Teamsters were able to reach a settlement, and the dispute was finally resolved.

The Teamsters were able to gain recognition in the brewery industry, and the AFL was able to retain its control over the industry.

The Teamsters’ success in resolving the dispute with the AFL was a major victory for the union movement, and it demonstrated the power of solidarity and the importance of unity in the struggle for workers’ rights.

In the 1990s, the Teamsters continued to work hard to maintain their position in the brewery industry, and they were able to resist efforts by the AFL to regain control over the industry.

Today, the Teamsters are the dominant union in the brewery industry, and they are able to negotiate strong contracts that benefit their members.

In conclusion, the history of the dispute between the AFL and the Teamsters over the management of the brewery drivers is a story of struggle and triumph. The Teamsters were able to overcome the AFL’s efforts to prevent them from gaining recognition, and they were able to negotiate strong contracts that benefit their members.

The Teamsters’ success in resolving the dispute with the AFL is a testament to the power of solidarity and the importance of unity in the struggle for workers’ rights. It is a story that all workers should study and learn from.

The Teamsters’ victory in the brewery industry is a victory for all workers, and it demonstrates the power of working class solidarity in the struggle for a better future. It is a story that all workers should study and learn from.
