Menace of Labor Deportation

by Jay Lovestone

Editorial from the "Socialist Review"

Labour's campaign for a just settlement of the International Labour Organization's Convention No. 145, which is due to be considered by the British delegation to the International Labour Conference at Geneva, is directed against the harassment of trade unionists in countries where such harassment is widespread. It is a campaign of principle, as well as of practical necessity, for the defence of the right to organize, and for the protection of the rights of workers in those countries where they are denied these rights.

The campaign is not confined to the discussion of the Convention itself, but includes a broad range of social issues, with particular reference to the problems of trade unionism and the rights of workers in the various countries.

In conclusion, the campaign for a just settlement of the International Labour Organization's Convention No. 145 is an important step in the struggle for the defence of the rights of workers, and for the establishment of a just and equitable international labour system.
A few years ago you would have asked, "What's happening?" and I would have answered, "Nothing much. There's a lot of discussion, but not much action." Today, however, the situation is quite different. People are getting organized, and the discussion has turned into action.

The change in Chicago is having a powerful impact on the entire country. The general strike called by the National Labor Relations Board has become a model for similar actions across the nation. The Chicago workers' struggle for a shorter workweek and better wages is not just a local issue; it's a national issue.

The workers in Chicago are no longer fighting alone. They are connected to a network of workers' organizations across the country. The Chicago Worker's Alliance, which was formed in response to the strike, now has chapters in cities all over the United States.

The strike has also inspired other workers to organize. In New York, the garment workers have begun a similar strike, demanding higher wages and better working conditions. In San Francisco, the dock workers are striking for better wages and shorter hours.

The workers in Chicago are not just fighting for themselves; they are fighting for all workers. They are demanding that the government step in and protect their rights. They are demanding that the government make it easier for workers to organize and strike. They are demanding that the government make it easier for workers to get the wages they deserve.

The workers in Chicago are not just fighting for their own rights; they are fighting for the rights of all workers. They are fighting for a better future for all workers. They are fighting for a world where workers are valued and respected.
