What is Social-Democracy? An interview with a member of the party, as printed in the Socialist Laborer of the district.

The town of Moscow, Nov. 16, 1905. I was visiting there last week and I noticed a marked change in the people's attitude. They seemed more interested in current events than before.

Under capitalism the daily press has to give up to most of the public what it says, even when it is in agreement with popular opinion. This is the case with the Social-Democratic party, which has a large influence among the working class.

The movement is growing steadily. In Moscow, for instance, there is a Social-Democratic society which has a membership of over 1,000.

The Russian Social-Democratic party is a revolutionary party. It stands for the complete overthrow of the capitalist system and the establishment of a socialist society.

The Social-Democratic party is opposed to the use of violence, believing that it is only through peaceful means that a socialist society can be achieved.

The party is divided into sections, each section being responsible for its own activities. The party is not centralized, but each section is free to make its own decisions.

The party is supported by the working class, who are its main members. It is not supported by the middle class, who are its main opponents.

The Social-Democratic party is not a secret society, but its activities are restricted to certain areas.

The Social-Democratic party is not a political party, but a revolutionary party.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS:

WHAT IS "IMPERSONABILITY"? By G. A. LAMB

"Impersonability" is an attempt to achieve a "higher" society by the elimination of all forms of personal identity and individuality. It is the solution to all social problems, the cure for all ills, the fountain of eternal youth. It is the "great" idea of the 20th century, the "miracle" of the future. It is the "unanswerable" argument of the "advanced" thinker, the "unanswerable" argument of the "advanced" politician.
