Victor L. Berger's Speech on the Eight-Hour Bill

(Press the Congressional Record)

Mr. Berger—Mr. Speaker and gentlefolk: I have been working for some time on the subject of a bill to reduce the worktime of the workingpeople of the world. I have talked to many labor leaders, and I have talked to many employers. I have talked to many members of Congress. I have talked to many people in the labor movement. I have tried to understand the needs of the workingpeople. I have tried to understand the needs of the employers. I have tried to understand the needs of the government. I have tried to understand the needs of the entire world. I have tried to understand the needs of the entire human race.

However, all these efforts have been in vain. The workingpeople of the world are still working too much. The employers are still trying to make them work too much. The government is still trying to make them work too much. The entire human race is still working too much. The only way to solve this problem is to pass a bill that will reduce the worktime of the workingpeople of the world.

The bill I have introduced is called the Eight-Hour Bill. It is a simple and straightforward bill. It states that every workingperson shall be entitled to no more than eight hours of work per day. It is a bill that will reduce the worktime of the workingpeople of the world. It is a bill that will make the world a better place to live.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill. I urge my colleagues to pass this bill. I urge my colleagues to make the world a better place to live. I urge my colleagues to support the Eight-Hour Bill. I urge my colleagues to make the world a better place to live.

WILL GET MUNICIPAL COAL

City Commissioner Carl P. Distas was found to hold back the order of the common council placing 100 tons of coal at the disposal of the Associated Charities to relieve the suffering of the poor.

This action came after Mr. Distas had threatened to defeat the public works committee and to stop all work on the municipal coal contract. The common council has already passed a resolution declaring that the order of the common council placing 100 tons of coal at the disposal of the Associated Charities to relieve the suffering of the poor.
