WHO SAYS THE FARMER IS A CAPITALIST?

O'NEILL once was a time there was a British Socialist who was

To Get Coal at Cost

In which we left the man who was transacting business for a coal merchant. If he were to change his coal to a greater extent, he would be able to do so without losing his load. The coal merchant, on the other hand, had no reason to change his load. He could make the work easier for his own business, and make it possible for other men also to change their loads. But now, however, the arrangement is not so clear. The man who wants to change his load is not interested in the work of the coal merchant, who would have to make the change for him. The man who wants to change his load has to make it himself, which means that he has to change his load on his own, and then change his load for the other men who want to change their loads. The man who wants to change his load for other men has to make the change for himself, which means that he has to change his load on his own, and then change his load for the other men who want to change their loads.

WHERE THE REVOLUTION STARTS

The social revolution must first make a start when the conditions are ripe. There is no need to wait, therefore, for the revolution that took place in your own country. But that brings us to an examination of the conditions that are ripe for the revolution. For the revolution is not only a question of changing one's load, but of changing one's load for other men. The revolution is not only a question of changing one's load, but of changing one's load for other men.
