IS SOCIOLOGICAL MATERIALISM?

Sociology is basically materialist. It has its origins in the study of the solving of managerial and practical problems. After the first SOCIETY was handed the burden of the development of the crude and primitive tool, which is used for hunting, we have seen the development of such things as the desire to produce more and to consume more. The development of the wheel was the result of the need to transport goods over long distatances. The development of the steam engine was the result of the need to move heavy materials over long distances. The development of the automobile was the result of the need to move people over long distances. The development of the airplane was the result of the need to move people over long distances. The development of the space shuttle was the result of the need to move people over long distances.

These developments are all examples of materialist progress. The materialist progress is the result of the need to solve practical problems.
The need to solve practical problems is the result of the need to live in a world that is not perfect. The need to solve practical problems is the result of the need to adapt to a world that is not perfect. The need to

The third class thought that, although they were placed in an unpleasant and dangerous situation, they would continue to work with the I. P. L. if we could not hopefully secure the right to work for themselves.

The matter was accordingly put to a vote by the workers, who decided to continue to work in cooperation with the I. P. L. For the terms of the ballot, see the next page. We are satisfied that they have recommended to their district organization, to make a protest, and if necessary, to take up the matter again.
