TWO LITTLE HEROINES

I have listened to all the speakers and I have no patience with the people who consider for the things pictured. I move that we go on a general strike.—Clara Lemlich, at the famous Cooper Union meeting.

The spontaneous strike of 20,000 shirt waist makers in New York City was the greatest event in the history of woman's work. The majority of the strikers were mere girls, few of them over twenty years of age. They had no "great" leaders, but among them were individuals strong enough and great enough to hold a place in the history of our country's industrial development. Two of these were Fannie Zinsher and Clara Lemlich. The following from The Survey is a sketch of the lives of these two brave little girls:

I have two pictures of Fannie Zinsher in my mind, one was she came from Russia at fourteen, fleeing from persecution to free America, with round cheeks, smiling, irresponsible lips and clear eyes full of interest and delight in living; the other after five years of American freedom, with sad sweet eyes whose sight was strained by the flashing of the needle and by study late at night, mouth drooping with a weight of sadness and responsibility and an expression of patience and endurance far beyond her twenty years.

She came a little high school girl from Kishineff to San Francisco. She did not know what work for wages was, but she and her brother four years older had to turn to and support a mother and a little brother. Three hundred power-machines in one long room of the garment factory welcomed this little human machine-in-the-making. The flash of the needles terrified her. She tried to work, but her nerves went more and more to pieces, her frightened eyes failed to follow her fingers as they guided her work and the second day she slid a finger open and was laid up for three weeks. When she returned she could adapt herself no better to the nervous strain. At piece, she earned little over one dollar a week, until a kind forewoman removed her to a smaller room where in time she rose to five dollars.

To the older generation among the Russian Jews the hardest thing of all about America is to find that they can take no part in industry; that it is only their little children, cherished and protected by their patriarchal institutions at home, who are quick and "smart" enough to be used in our industries. For the sixteen years of her widowhood Mrs. Zinsher had supported her family in Russia trying to give them a fair start in life, and now after six months in California she felt that the fear of persecution at home, near relatives and friends, was not so deadly for her children as the machine, with no hope, even, of better things to follow. With what remained of the money she had brought to America she came east to sail, only to learn that a second massacre of her race was going on at Kishineff. So the two children settled down again to the machine and in a year the third boy took up the work.

But they wished for something better and studied at night for the regents' examinations. The older brother matriculated at a dental college and has been studying for eighteen months. Fannie passed her examinations a year ago, but the strike came and the money went and it will be back to the machine again when the strike is settled, not to save for the future, but to make up arrears of debt. The younger brother, a tackle on undergarments, is laid off now as his employer fears the strike will spread to his trade and so refuses to cut out new work. That is the situation as it stands today.

In the four years preceding the strain was continuous—to adjust oneself to mechanical work at a high tension all day and then turn to mental work at night and all Sunday. And during that time distress and worry of mind were seldom absent. The student frequently lost her place because school prevented her from working the prescribed number of hours a day—that is, from 8 a.m. to 8.30 p.m. for about six months in the year, and Sunday from 8 to 1, or sometimes to 5. For the same reason her pay was small, even when she had worked. The end of mingled study and work came a year ago when she went to the position she held when the strike began, making nine dollars a week for the long day—tuck ing 2,200 yards a day, for which she should have received $13.20 at the piece wage of $2.90 a day—and planning to save for study.

Perhaps during her years of night school she had had no time to notice conditions in the shops. Now she was free to observe and what she saw of petty persecution, speeding and overwork made her join the union, made her bring her friends in with her. The spirit spread until 140 out of the 165 in the shop during the slack season were or- ganized. The union, Fannie Zinsher believes, is the only possible way of protecting the factory worker, for, she says, the factory inspector is regularly duped girls are primed how to answer his ques- tions, and the forewoman is on hand to see that they say the right things; girls under age are hidden away in closets or under tables and, in general, the law is never violated in any respect so far as the inspector can find out.

In the recent strike Fanny was ar- rested for speaking to one of the pickets. The officer pinched her arm black and blue as he dragged this dangerous crim- inal to court, and there glibly told the judge she had been arrested four times before. Her heart leaped at the insult. Quick as thought she raised her hand, "I swear I have never been arrested be- fore." Her face and tone gave the man the lie. He turned purple and could make no answer, but she was fined just the same, on his evidence.

Fannie Zinsher is strong and steadfast, but the soul of this young woman's revolution was Clara Lemlich, a spirit of fire and tears, devoid of egotism, unable to tolerate suffering. She inspired the dramatic climax of the strike when this girl was raised to the platform at Cooper Union and "with the simplicity of genius," as one reporter says, put the motion for the general strike, "I have listened to all the speakers and I have no patience for talk. I am one who feels and suffers for the things pictured. I move that we go on a general strike," she said. Dramatic, too, was the moment two years before when she stood, a solitary little figure, distributing circulars of her union to the girls employed in the "worst shop in New York." For this "disorderly con- duct" she was arrested and had her first experience of a prison cell.

At sixteen her real education began— in the shop. Her description of the slow and blundering way she pieced together the relation of the workers to their work and their employer recalls the slow dawn ing in Judge Lindsey's mind of the outline of the "Beast." What outraged her most from the beginning were the petty persecutions, the measliness, and the failure to recognize the girls as human beings. She tells of the forewoman following a girl if she left the room and hurrying her back. She again of the pay of the new girls kept down because they did not know what the market rate was. of excessive fines, of frequent "mistakes" in pay envelopes hard and har- rassing to rectify; of a system of reg- istering on the time clock that stole more than twenty minutes from the lunch hour, of the office clock covered so that the girls could not waste time looking at it, or put back an hour so that they should not know that they were working overtime. She sat and worked
May-Day, Woman and Labor

JACK WOOD

"Come, let us cast off foolishness, and put on thewise and righteous. For the cause alone is worthy till the good days being the better.

Come, join to the only battle wherein no man can fail, when whose faitheth and dieth, yet his deed shall still prevail.

Ah, I come, cast off foolishness, for this, at least, of life is but a day. That the dawn and the day is coming, and forth the banners go.

There will be more women interested in labor, and "Labor-Day" demonstrations this May-Day, than ever before in the history of the labor movement. And the evolution is good. Given opportunity woman finds her work. Economic disturbances are making the opportunity. "The social question of today," said Disraeli, "is only a zephyr which rustles the leaves, but will soon become a hurricane. It is a day that cannot hear the mutterings of the coming storm."

Conventionalism and tradition are dying. Woman is on the march.

The enemies of old were outside the city walls. Today they are within. Not over sea. The working class of any given nation does not hate nor wish to fight the working class of any other nation. In the new array of battle woman is in the front rank. Why? How? Because the modern enemy within the city walls concern in particular the wife, the mother and the child, Mammon sings forever, "Suffer the little children to come unto me for of such is the kingdom of the almighty dollars."

Adulteration, factory laws, workshops, store and mining conditions, come close to the home, and mother love and heart. She, woman, wants a vote on these matters, and is most directly interested in them. Bad food—non-sanitary work places, overwork and no work, these be the home-breakers, and woman has been kept silent. And as to child labor where the child's sob drawn tender in its silence when the strong man in his wrath when woman has spoken she has been told to keep in her sacred sphere—the arena of the stove, there to offer up her body as a living sacrifice on that altar three times per diem.

In the June Cosmopolitan Mrs. Elizabeth Gilmer, on the "Troubles of Women," makes Mirandy answer her supposed better half thus:

"'I don't ask him what is women's sacred sphere, an' he don't know no more than a rabbit. But I dose.' I done took notice when women's sacred sphere is done of the jets don't get no pay to 'em, an' dat no man ain't hankin' after.' 'S long's a woman stays at home an' patches her husband's britches, an' musses de babies, an' does dis 'cookin' an' de scrubbin', an' takes in laundry', the woman was on de side to help out wid de rent money an' keep de pot boilin', ev'ry man thinks she is des where she ought to be, 'cuz he ain't a-homin' after dem jobs. But when she gets where she gits real money, an' somethin' easy to do, den a howl goes up dat she's done jumped over de bars, an' got out of her sacred sphere, an' dat's along of de trouble of bein' a woman.'"

It has been well written that the "basis of all oppression is economic dependence on the oppressor." Today woman is "kicking" and the kicked howl. They aver she is overconservative and wouldn't know how to use her vote. Bah! If women make worse use of their votes than men have done, they'd be superhuman.

Advisory boards of women should be attached to all city councils; nay, further, women should be elected on to city councils. A lady member was recently elected to the London county council. As architects women would so arrange windows and drains, and passages, that light, comfort and health would result.

I read of a fully certified man surveyor inspecting some public works in the London county (Will Crooks, late M. P. for Woolrich, told this in the house of commons) and when he came to a well, under construction, he mounted his eye glass and said, "Aw, I wonder how high this well is?" Poor fellow! A vote means bread, clothes, shelter, life! At all extents that's what it should mean. A vote bears, or should bear, on the administration of things, and conditioning of environment and in these women, child, home are especially concerned—and to now are voiceless. Women are concerned with the great labor problems, and should agitate and organize. And get down to bed-rock, and with the great potential mother instinct, stop the "never-ending audacity of self-seeking persons," and make politics and industrial organization spell the conservation of human life, social, civic and national.

Sound economics are good—so is sweet, clean sentiment. Both are factors in growth.

A woman has a right to vote because she is a human being, a citizen. In trades unions, leagues, schools, Socialist locals, etc., woman's insight, tact, patience and attention to detail are desperately needed. And this May Day—the International Labor Day—should give an impetus to women to make common effort with men, against the common enemy, and combine forces by all possible methods to usher in, in the words of William Morris,

The wonderful day's coming.
When all shall be better than well.

The Philadelphia Situation

LUETTLE TWINING

The most significant feature of the Carmen’s strike in Philadelphia are the sympathetic strike that was called soon after the fact and went on for two weeks, involving 200,000 men and women; the awakening of the workers of this city to the fact that the government is the bulwark of capitalism; and the great organization of Carmen’s wives that has been built up in two weeks, numbering five thousand women.

Government Officials Control Situation

Senator Penrose, Director Clay and other officials have taken charge of affairs for the Transit company. There was not even an attempt at a settlement till those senators appeared, Mr. McNichols coming from Florida where he had fled to get away from the strike. Indeed, so apparent has been the connivance between the Transit company and the state and city officials that even the least observant have been forced to see it. Mayor Reyburn has issued statements for the Transit company showing that the city hall is openly against the strikers; police are put on the cars to run them and scab on the Carmen; when the Carmen attempted to hold a meeting in the ball park, which had been rented for that purpose, mounted policemen rode into men, women and children, striking them down and beating them on the heads with clubs, till the pavement was covered with blood. So active has the government been in attempting to break the strike that the strikers and their wives discuss the political situation almost exclusively. It might well be called a “political strike.”

Meet April 20th to Form a Labor Party

Organized labor of Philadelphia will meet April 20th to form a labor party. Socialist sentiment is strong among the strikers, but not sufficiently so to control the situation. The secretary-treasurer of the Carmen, Hugh Barron, is a good Socialist and, indeed, I think it is not too much to say that almost all the prominent members of the Carmen’s union are Socialists. However, the majority do not yet understand the class struggle, and will be obliged to learn by bitter experience that the only party that can help them is one based on the principle of class antagonism. They have advanced far enough to wish a labor party and when they shall have seen its deficiencies they will then be ready for the Socialist party. The victory in Milwaukee caused a great excitement and I predict it will have an influence on the convention to be held the 20th. All I have talked to on that question admit they could have won their strike had the Socialists been in power here, but they insist that all can agree on a labor party while many would oppose the Socialist party. They do not realize that a large vote for the Socialist ticket would so frighten the powers that be that they would offer concessions that they will not even consider now. Till the workers learn that their interests are opposed to the Cap-italist’s and that is the reason the police are called out when a strike is on, they will be helpless. The strikers see that the city, state and national officials are against them, but they do not see that the fact is fundamental. They do not yet know that all governments throughout history have defended the class in power and that they were established for that purpose. The Socialist party is the labor party that stands for the interests of the workers. A new labor party is superfluous.

Short Story of the Strike

In June the Carmen went on strike and went back to work after an agreement had been signed by the company and the Carmen. The Carmen being suspicious of the Transit company, Senators Penrose and McNichols promised them that, should the company not live up to its agreement, they would see that a law was passed compelling it to do so. The senators were lying and double-crossing as usual. As soon as the men went back to work the company began to discharge them in large numbers every day. Another cause for grievance is the Key-stone union formed by the Transit company for the purpose of destroying the Carmen’s union. They started fights immediately and tried in every way possible to break up the Carmen’s union. The crowning blow was the discharge of 174 men in one day and the threat to discharge as many as the more the next. A vote was taken among the members of the Carmen’s union as to whether they would strike. The vote carried to strike and they went out in February. A sympathetic strike followed, not only to show the Transit company that organized labor of Philadelphia stood by the Carmen, but to protest against injuries suffered by the various unions. After two weeks the strikers went back to work that they might assist the Carmen financially. From the time the Carmen went on strike the Transit company has done everything in its power to injure the Carmen. No outrage has been too great to perpetrate upon them. The Transit company has lost the sands of dollars through the strike. Last week it asked the city for a loan of $750,000 and begged for $100,000 immediately. The company could not afford the fares. A passenger had a conduct arrested for not ringing up his fare. The case was taken to court and the conductor was defended by the Transit company lawyer. Every day many persons are run over and killed; today three persons, a man, a woman, and a child. Yesterday two children were killed; the day before three persons and an ambulance containing three very sick children was ground to pieces. The grand jury has demanded that competent men be put on the cars to run them and that the business men sympathize with the Carmen but because their business is paralyzed by the strike.

From ten to twenty Carmen are arrested daily on the charge of “inciting to riot.” They are bailed out for amounts ranging from $1,000 to $20,000. You can see that this will be a terrific drain on the treasury of the Carmen union. However, they have paid out of their own pockets and the strike benefits amount to $30,000. Three young ladies gave a dance for the benefit of the strikers last Saturday. The police gathered around the hall and at first refused to allow the hall to be opened. After the women succeeded in opening the hall the police crowded in and infested the hall all evening.

The Woman’s Auxiliary

The formation of the Woman’s auxiliary of the Carmen’s union has been the redeeming feature of the strike. Within two weeks 4,000 women have joined this organization. Two weeks ago the first general meeting was held. The writer was elected president and Mrs. Theodore West secretary. When the volunteers were called to serve on the committees, the women arose in such large numbers and came forward to give their names that it was necessary to ask them to remain in their seats. There was danger of their breaking down the platform. It was certainly refreshing to see members of a union so anxious to serve. They had to be restrained. Generally, as is well known, it is difficult to get people to do anything. The women are holding bazaars and fairs all over the city. Every day at least a dozen fairs are going on in the different car-barn districts. They make from $300 to $800 at each affair, everything sold is donated. It is truly inspiring to see the women work. Comrade Elizabeth Baer, with whom I
It is a poor movement, cold and unenticing, that has not its days of stock-taking when it tallies up the sum total of the past year’s achievements and drinks a toast to the victories that are ahead.

For the Socialist movement, the movement of the hewers of wood and drawers of water, it is especially fitting that its day of celebration be May Day. That is the flower month, when out of the seeming winter of the death springs forth the splendor of the newly created life. It is the season of the fulfillment of the promise made in the winds of the rising discontent and the showers of new hopes. It means that labor is to come into its own.

The past year has been one of great dissatisfaction and great protest. It is not surprising that, following the hard times and the suffering entailed in the wake of it, the spirit of resistance would grow among the wage workers and that it would find its expression in contests with the masters for improved conditions of employment.

What was somewhat more surprising was the awakening of the east side of New York, Philadelphia and other cities. And, later on, the still further awakening of the least of all the great centers, the metropolis of our foremost industrial state.

In both instances it meant the increased participation of women in the real industrial and social problems. When the girls of the sewing machines and looms went out on strike, so many thousands strong, they earned their citizenship. The right of woman suffrage was removed beyond the pale of dispute. It became a certainty.

Woman’s demand for the suffrage is no longer a sex question; it is a social question. Women’s demand to share equally with man the privileges and responsibilities of the common life is of pressing importance. It carries with it nothing less than the help of his dearest companion in winning his emancipation, an emancipation that must be hers not one jot less than his.

The year, too, has been marked by victorious attacks upon the independency of the workers’ press. Obscure laws have been dug up, defamation of character, misuse of the mails and the uttering of seditious sentiments charged for a pretext, all with the view of gagging the voice of the people. But the press has come out unscathed and is warring only the more valiantly against the agencies of darkness.

And to pour fresh courage into the hearts of the men and women of the Socialist movement, there is the victory in Milwaukee. However one may explain away the Socialist successes at the polls that dot the map from Massachusetts to California, Milwaukee explains itself. It signifies the dawn of the new social conscience. It tells us that out of the middle west is rising a sturdy oak whose branches will soon spread over the whole nation. It is the pledge that the tiller of the soil and his brothers of the factory and market place will soon be taking their ease in their own orchard.

May Day this year is but the prologue to the many happier May Days in store for us. It is like the first green tuft against the wealth of color of the flowers—

“All a blowin’ and a growin’ for the cause.”

House work, because it is performed in isolation, because it is purely individual labor, has never been clased among the industries. It has neither been looked upon as a normal feminine function, a form of healthy exercise. No one has ever suggested to legislators that sweeping and beating rugs might be included among the dusty trades; that bending over steaming washtubs, and almost immediately after going out into the street to hang out clothes, might be harmful to the throat and lungs; that remaining within doors at a time, as house workers almost invariably do, reacts on nerves and the entire physical structure; that steady service, if not actual labor from six in the morning until nine and ten at night makes excessive demands on mind and body.

The Mitigator

Elsa C. Untermann

In the east a brilliant red was leaping, dispelling the black clouds of the night; birds were beginning sleepily to sing their morning songs, and flowers to shake off their baths of dew when the maiden, inspired by the grandeur of the dawn, made a last strenuous effort to reach the summit of the Hills of the Past. Pausing on the last range she turned to view the panorama of mountains and desert over which she had passed in order to reach her goal and felt very grateful that it was behind her; then she slowly descended into the Valley of Human Life.

Long had been her journey and fraught with much hardship so that her tunic was dusty and torn, her sandals of no protection to her cut and swollen feet, and the flute which she had guarded carefully and continually during her tramp was as a stranger from long disuse.

Now that the difficult climbing and anxiety of her journey were at an end she attempted to play, but found that the instrument was clogged with dust. Seeing this she hastened in the direction of a beautiful wood in the center of the valley from whence came the blithe songs of birds and the clear melody of running water. Among these soothing surroundings she seated herself and at once began to clean the flute, using the hem of her robe for this purpose. No thought was given to her weary feet and burning face which she might have bathed in the brook. The desire to renew her acquaintance with the flute, her constant, beloved companion, the means through which she expressed her individuality, alone possessed her.

Occasionally as she paused from cleaning the flute she blew upon it and at first it gave forth only harsh, discordant notes that awakened demon echoes in the wood and caused the birds to flutter and screech in a panic. Human beings hearing it on the Plain of Established Ideas and Customs halted for a moment in their tasks and listened. Some laughed and said: “Oho, there sound the notes of another invader of the wood of New Ideas and Forces. ‘Tis pretty music, indeed, that he makes; rather like the croak of a bullfrog in the marsh.”

Others, not quite so superficial and narrow-minded, thought thus: “We have no time to heed the message now; perhaps it will grow clearer in the future. Then we will consider.”

But the maiden, unaware of this, persisted steadily in her efforts to bring back the clear, full tones of the flute, and gradually succeeded. Then she bathed in the stream of Practical Experience that pursued its course through the wood and also washed her tunic in it.

Thus refreshed, she noticed for the first time the beauty about her, the exhilarating life that flourished in this wood of New Ideas. The sunlight filtering through the trees was reflected in the brook and seemed to blend with its rippling music; the purple violets, yellow lilies, and white orchids, against their green background of moss and grass, nodded and carried on a conversation in gentle whispers; in the grass ants and caterpillars moved to and fro; on the edge of the brook a little green snake lay sunning itself, its eyes alert and bright; butterflies fluttering here and there added splashes of color to the scene; birds and squirrels, too, were there with chirp and chatter. Everywhere, beauty, beauty, beauty; music, music, music. Intoxicated the maiden raised the flute to her lips and mingled her melody with Nature’s songs.

Immediately there came a change over the beings on the Plain of Established Ideas; some hypnotized by the exquisite strains quickly dropped the tools with which they had tilled the ground and hastened straightway in the direction of the wood; others merely expressed the opinion that the music was inspiring and encouraging, but that its theme was mere idealism, a utopian dream. And, strange as it may seem, there were still others all unconscious of the voice of the flute.

However, those who had left the plain eagerly sought the maiden and when they had found her, pried her with innumerable questions. To these she replied with her flute:

“To reply to your queries and make clear all the things you desire to know,” she said, “I must speak of periods in human history that are far distant, receding from the mind’s eye and causing it a great effort to grasp the object of its attention as it strains the physical eye to hold in view the mast of an outgoing ship. There were days when women sat in the council circle beside the men and voiced their opinions without constraint. If by any chance a person who had been vested with authority misused that authority, which occurred very rarely, the women were the first to rise and wrathfully demand that he be removed. Their mothers and sisters were more cautious than the men of viewing affairs from a general, human standpoint rather than from an individual. So in a case where the interests of the community were neglected they expressed themselves in a manner similar to the following:

“We have placed our general affairs in his hands that he may conduct them as impartially as we attempt to fulfill your smaller duties. If he imposes upon us his will instead of the will of the majority of the tribe, if he uses his position for his personal advantage, if he does not see that the good of one is the good of all, he must go!”

“And consequently, there was peace between the members of the tribe. “The labor of a society or community was divided between the sexes according to the abilities and convenience of each.”

“As the women were unable to go from place to place in search of gas or to protect the tribe because the children were necessarily in their care, land was placed in their hands and they tilled it. The products thereof were prepared for consumption and also to game that the men provided. The household goods were also the property of the women. Upon marriage of a woman she moved to the abode of his wife’s relatives. Children were entirely in the hands of their mother, and all individuals traced their descent through the mother only. This was also inevitable under the circumstances as under the system of marriage that prevailed at that time it was scarcely possible to have children on the faith that the father was the identified male of the family.

“Men hunted to procure meat for their tribe and sought to protect it against invasion. Then war often afflicted the people, the cause of it generally being fear of one tribe that another would gain possession of the food supply which Nature had endowed its localities at that time food was very scarce, hence, being armed with much knowledge that would enable the in their own efforts to increase the food that nature had thrown in their way. So a fishing tribe guarded zealously a stream that supplied it with life; the men hunting tribes rigorously kept invades out of the forests or off the plains where they caught game.

“In those primeval days human beings were bitterly opposed each other and refused to be made man of fear that they would be robbed of the food that furthered their existence. In glaring contrast to this stand the wars of your own time, that nations wage against each other or against helpless savage state in the mad scramble to get rid of surplus products that are overstocked your warehouses and mills. The same individuals who, with their wives and children, produced the goods which are not allowed to consume, although starving, are sent out to butcher the other in order that their exploit may have an opportunity to force upon other nations the products that they themselves need but cannot purchase because the full, may, not even the test result of their toil was given them. One of the questions that is facing the workers of the country is that of industrial education. There was a time when organized labor and the workers in general looked with disfavor on industrial education.

But industrial education continued to grow, first in private trade schools, then in the public schools and the workers began to recognize that there was something that had come apparently to stay and that they must deal with it.

They saw also that a change had taken place in industry. That the old apprenticeship system that flourished in earlier days had gone to pieces under the new factory system, that today with the extreme subdivision of labor it is not only possible for a youth to learn a trade in a factory, he will become only a machine tender. If the youth can only acquire the knowledge of the machine, he will be able to do the job. By the time he reaches the age of twenty, he will be a first-class operator. This is the system that has been established.

For years American capitalists have been watching the industrial development of Germany and have come to believe that Germany's strength lies in her trained workmen. So they same capitalists made up their minds that it was necessary to train American workmen in such a manner that they would turn out better products. They began this with private run trade schools. Now it has been evidenced that the industrial education of our youth cannot be left in the hands of those who are interested only in making our boys and girls into better trained and more skilled workmen. One teacher in one of the trade schools said to me, "Our object is to, in three months, turn out a workman who can work rapidly and so be a profitable employee."

Another matter that is of great importance. The attitude of boys and girls toward the present system and their class organization can be largely determined by the attitude of the teacher. One teacher in one of the Chicago schools said recently to me in conversation: "The boys who go out from under my hands will never have any sympathy for trade unions if I can help it.

All these are questions that the worker must inform himself about and must take an active part in the effort to themselves gain control of the school.

You cannot leave the training of the minds of your children in the hands of the ruling class. An eminent psychologist has said that it is difficult to change the habits of a man after his twenty-fifth year. It is hard to change the mind of the man or woman who from childhood has been trained by the master class.

Our children are not receiving the best from the public schools. The Socialist movement has always and always will stand in support of the public school system, but that does not hinder us from seeing its defects and neither does it blind us to the fact that today we do not control the public schools, that we do not in a large number of cases even have a chance to elect a school board — in Chicago it is appointed by the mayor —that we have nothing to say about what or how our children shall be taught.

If every Socialist father and mother would try to take the time to visit the school, they can attend, to note the defects remedied, the bad ventilation, the overcrowding, the slight amount of time the teacher can give to each pupil, the absolute absence of any possibility of having the special powers of the child even discovered let alone having them trained; then begin an active campaign to arouse the workers to the fact that to make a change in these conditions they must unite politically.

Let the workers keep their eyes on the industrial programs advocated by the commercial men of the country. See whether they will mean that our boys and girls will become only better machines or real men and women.

The principal of one of Chicago's technical schools said to me not long ago, a man thoroughly imbued with the commercial spirit, "If I had my way I would cut out every bit of history and civics and give these boys and girls only the bare hand training. That is all they need, anyway."

No thought on the part of these men of training human beings capable of thinking and acting and appreciating the best in life only how to make these boys and girls good workmen.

We concede that a good workman is necessary, but he will not be less a good workman because he has not had every particle of initiative and individuality crushed out of him by the factory system.

The commercial club of Chicago is now taking in hand the formulating of the course of industrial education for our Chicago children. The workers have little to say.

Throughout the country similar conditions exist. The workers should at once begin to take notice. Mothers and fathers should take part in the work in the future of their children. Here is a place you can reach many a parent through his and her children. Begin now.

Let us face the truth that we have two institutions which are back numbers in twentieth century civilization; two left-overs from a past-and-gone domestic system of industry. One of these is the tene-ment sweat shop where women combine, or try to combine, manufacturing and housekeeping. The other is the private kitchen—the home—where the last stand of conservatism and tradition, the last lingering remnant of hand labor, continues to exist.—Rheta Childe Dorr, in Hampton's Magazine for May.

The woman suffrage convention recently held in Washington, D. C., is said to have held more promise for a rich field of Socialist propaganda than any like meeting in the past. The suffragists must be brought to see that the ultimate use of the ballot should be economic freedom, and that economic freedom cannot come about save through Socialism.

This special Workers' edition should be widely used for propaganda.
LONG LIVE MILWAUKEE!

Milwaukee has elected a full Socialist ticket. Long live Milwaukee! I could imagine the scene as it was more delightful, than to hear the band play The Marseillaise in Milwaukee on May Day. "Ye sons of toil, awake to glory!" It is a splendid song. But what infinite meaning it must have to the Milwaukean Socialists.

The victory of our comrades has not come about like a surprise party. Nor like a thief in the night. It is the result of long, patient, tireless labor, of determination and organization. We haven't heard much about "splits" in the Milwaukee party. If there have been and are any, their noise has been drowned in the eagerness of the majority to push forward the propaganda work. Literally tons of literature have been unloaded upon the people. It has been a step by step victory for the classless and for all the unresisting residents. So much of it that the women used to burn it as fast as it came in. Finally the men, seeing their wives destroying so much literature, interfered, and read the stuff through curiosity. Gradually it got hold of them, and today we have the results. If the Milwaukee comrades are as resourceful as they are energetic, we will have, in a few years, at least one "Socialist" city in the United States.

The lesson to be learned from their victory is, agitate, educate, organize and avoid useless contention.

SUFFRAGISTS AND HOTTENTOTS.

At least two last Presidents of the United States have placed themselves on record regarding woman and her status. President Roosevelt's idea was that mothers should occupy themselves in preventing race suicide—through increased production; and President Taft now makes himself famous by alluding to Hottentots when discussing the advisability of granting woman the ballot. One condition that he would impose before granting suffrage to an unfranchised class is, he said, "that the class should be intelligent enough to know its own interests. The idea that Hottentots or any uneducated, altogether unintelligent class is prepared for self-government at once, or should immediately take part in self-government, is a theory I wholly dissent from. But it is not applicable to the present situation." But if not applicable, why bring it in? Why suggest such a comparison? Then followed the statement that the danger in conferring political power upon a class not ready to use it, was that it "might be exercised by that part of the class least desirable." Here the President was interrupted by hisses from parts of the hall. When they had ceased he said:

"Now, my dear ladies, you must show yourselves capable of suffrage by exercising that degree of restraint which is necessary in the conduct of government affairs by not hissing."

The association naturally regretted the hissing incident, and a vote of thank was tendered the President for his address of welcome. Rev. Anna Shaw, however, with her plentiful fund of it dependent wit, said, regarding the ladies: "They were young, and did not know that it was a matter of much difference what the President says.

MOTHER LOVE.

A woman, evidently a "fallen" woman, or as who had "lived too low," we find dead in her room in a third-rate hotel. One of our reporters went up to the little room in her lodging house was found the following note:

MAY-DAY

The leaders of industry display their colors and strength at such fetes as horse shows, operas, Palm Beach promenades, etc., where they gather periodically to show their world how much larger are the spoils which they have seized from all directions than they were when they last appeared at the rendezvous. Then amid frivolity, lavish display, carousing and laughter each attempts to outdo the other in squandering the plunder.

Labor's assemblies are of a very different character. On the first of May the exploited everywhere gather at an appointed meeting place and march quietly, impressively with only an occasional burst of music, to a distant point of the city where leaders speak to their fellows and encourage them. That army marching through the streets causes the captains of industry many a sleepless night. They know too well what that determined attitude, those songs express. To them the words are as plain as to us: "We built the streets of this city, the mills where we toil, produced the goods in the storehouses, erected your palaces. They belong to us, and it is inevitable that in time we shall possess them.

The echo of those countless feet is the specter at the feast of the exploiters and prevents the drunken revelers from attacking each other. In fear of it they cling together shivering.

Many events have occurred since last year's May Day to swell the army of labor. May the trend of its feet this season echo and re-echo over the land and spread to all the fact that our numbers are doubled and victory is twice as near!

The Marriage Contract

LIDA PARCE

In the last installment of The M. C. we showed that marriage according to the present form of contract is, for the woman, a legal status of slavery. A slavery only modified by the fact that she cannot be killed or sold by her owner. This as not an emotional outburst, a mere expression of the feelings of the writer; it have a clear statement from the rape and judicial, Sir Henry Maine, sat the laws regarding married women are those of a primitive civilization; and the laws themselves define the position if married women in the plain terms of averly. This is what Mr. Blackstone says about the position of the married woman: “By marriage, the husband and wife are one person at law. The very thing, or legal existence of the woman is suspended, during the marriage, or at least is incorporated and consolidated to that of her husband. . . . Upon this principle of a union of person in husband and wife depend almost all the legal rights, duties and disabilities that either of them acquire by the marriage.”

And Tiffany, in "Persons and Domestic Relations" (p. 116), says: "It is the legal existence of the woman only that is affected by marriage. A man's legal capacity remains virtually unimpaired. A man's power to contract is not affected by his marriage, except that he cannot, by his contract, deprive the wife of rights which she acquires in his property by virtue of the marriage.

As we saw in the last number, the wife, while she has no claim to anything, not even her clothing, during her husband's life, becomes to a person during that time, on his death, acquires a title to one-third of his property. For his death she again becomes a human being. You remember that the husband and wife are the possessors, both during her life and after her death.

The following citations are from Tiffany's "Persons and Domestic Relations":

"Marriage mutually entitles the husband and wife to cohabitation and intercourse, but in this country there is no way in which this law can be judicially enforced."—P. 49.

"It is not rape for a husband to have intercourse with his wife by force, and against her will."—P. 48.

"At common law the husband is entitled absolutely to his wife's earnings.

"The husband alone is entitled to receive such earnings, and he must sue therefor in his own name. In the case of death the action cannot be maintained by the wife, as she has never been entitled to the earnings, but must be brought by the personal representative of her husband."—P. 87.

This is justified on the theory that the husband "supports" the wife. We shall now see what sort of support this is, and you will observe that while the law puts into his hand the means of collecting the wages, it does not give her the legal means of collecting the "support." She must get someone else to do that at his own peril and expense.

A husband is bound to support his wife, and if he leaves her without the means of support she becomes an agent of necessity to supply her wants on his credit. This right arises where the husband has driven the wife away."—P. 122.

"The husband's liabilities for necessaries purchased by his wife on his credit, where his wife is supported by him, depends upon the existence of agency in (a). If they are living together, the fact of cohabitation raises the presumption of authority in fact. (b) If they are living apart, the presumption is against her authority to bind him, and the burden is on the person dealing with her to show such authority."—P. 118.

"As a rule, where a husband fails to provide for his wife, she becomes his agent of necessity to purchase necessaries on his credit."—P. 118.

This, then, is what there is in the theory that a husband must support his wife. Imagine a woman working for wages. Her husband "has driven her away," but he can collect the wages, and she can then get her living by inducing confiding tradesmen to give her goods on the credit of a man who has cast her out, and who has no property on which a debt could possibly be collected. The law permits her to get the goods, but she does not have a pressure of the lawman, and she can collect the bill. Naturally this kind of "credit" cannot go very far. And yet it is the only way that is provided whereby a woman, even when she works for wages, can secure the necessary of life, if her husband sees fit to "drive her away." In New York, you will be told, they make a man support his family. If he goes away and leaves them, he can be brought back and sent to jail for the offense. But if you ask troublesome questions you will find that the family must pay the expense of bringing him back, and then he is sent to jail, where he could not possibly support his family if he wanted to.

It doesn't seem quite credible that laws could be so cheap and tawdry as this. It doesn't seem possible that anything so base and shameful could be calmly executed in the name of law, in this age. Yet there the laws are. There is no way of getting around them. Some statutes have been enacted here and there, and some equity law has been developed to mitigate some of the evils of some of the laws. But no one has ever thought of such a thing as controverting the principle that he woman ceases to be an independent human, being when she marries.

The above are only a few of the clauses under the principal heads of the laws relating to the status of married women, but they will suffice to show the true purpose and essential constitution of marriage. Each state has made its own modifications upon the common law, so that the utmost confusion prevails. There is not the smallest attempt at uniformity. A married woman's status before the law is different in all the states; so that if she enter into a marriage contract in one state, and moves into another state, she must live under the terms of a different contract from the one she signed. But these facts have created no excitement whatever. It seems a strange and illogical thing that an agitation for uniformity should have begun with the divorce laws instead of the marriage laws. But such is the fact. It would be a good thing for interested people to write to their legislators and write to newspapers and write to judges as if it is women who suffer from the marriage laws, and women who get the greater number of divorces, it is perhaps natural that the men who make the laws should have more enthusiasm for uniformity in divorce.

The suffrage women of New York are telling us that they expect to have the suffrage in a very few years. In New York the husband is "absolutely entitled to the wife's wages." Now suppose that Mrs. B is elected to the legislature in that state. She goes to Albany and helps to make the laws for the state. But when it comes time to draw her salary, Mr. B has to draw the money and sign the voucher. His wife cannot sign the voucher nor draw the money, because she is not a human being under the law. Plainly these marriage laws stand directly in the way of woman's progress in either social or legal status. They stand in the way of any ethical standard of conduct between the sexes, and are sufficient proof that no such standard exists. They cast a sinister shade over the institution of marriage, and surround it with suggestions of indigence, brutality, exploitation, lust, greed, and everything that is unhealthy and repugnant to sensibilities of refinement. To be sure, the terms of the contract are kept out of sight, so that people enter into it without knowing how indecent it is, but enough of the impression of its general nature filters into the consciousness of society so that it helps to keep it closed in the same plane. It is difficult, in view of the laws, to accept the protestation that is made, that the state has to interfere in marriage in order to preserve high moral ideals.

The Stuff of which Revolutionaries are Made

ANNA A. MALEY

Pretty little Rose sat in my room in the hotel in Pittsburgh telling the story of the 1909 stogy strike and stogie makers’ strike. She had been one of the strikers—she had been in, in fact, the striker, the little firebrand most respected by the boss.

What were the grievances? Well, to begin with, it was an open shop. Most of the employees were boys, young women and old men. Brutal foremen were employed who bullied the unorganized, defenseless workers. The strippers sat in a damp basement lighted only by flaring gas. Their feet rested in the bottom of the troughs where lay the wet stock and the clothing of the girls was soaked from knees to body, for on their laps they held the wet tobacco up which they worked. The fumes from the tobacco made the eyes smart and the head ache. The girls kept their foreheads bandaged. Three-fourths of them wore glasses. They were frequently ill and at such times the men on the floor banded coarse, vile, insinuating remarks.

Upstairs conditions were but little better. The old building was neglected and dirty. The heads of the workers reached almost to the drying racks so that they constantly breathed the steam from the tobacco. The air was filled with tobacco dust and the common question was, “Has he consumption yet?”

The final rupture came on the matter of charge for stock. Each worker was allowed so much stock out of which to make his goods. If he found it necessary to draw more than was allowed him, the surplus was charged to him and deducted from his wages. A strict minimum of inferior stock was furnished. If a worker worked fast enough to make anything on the piece system, he destroyed so much stock that the amount allowed him did not half cover his requirements.

A first-class price was charged to the worker for stock destroyed. The fragments were made into smoking or chewing tobacco, but no credit was given the worker for this. So great did the grant on this stock charge become that almost one-third of the workers’ earnings were absorbed again by the boss. He feared that there would be a protest on a payday when the robbery had been specially heavy. Notice was, therefore, served that the help must visit the pay window one at a time instead of in a group, as they usually came. However, five of the workers came together and, on making the deductions, they refused to accept their envelopes. They were promptly discharged and the manager forbade them to return upstairs for their wraps and working implements. But the workers returned and called the whole shop out. Presently the policemen were summoned to “pacify” the crowd of boys, girls and old men who congregated in front of the store.

The strikers met and drew up their demands—dismissal of brutal foremen, clean shop, proper lights, separate drying room and abolition of the system of charge for stock. After a stubborn fight of five weeks all demands were granted except the abolition of charge for stock, which was left pending, and the strikers returned.

During the five weeks of the strike, Rose had kept close watch of the progress in the shop. The busy season was on, the bosses were losing heavily and by carrying this information among the strikers, Rose encouraged them to stick. Many of them were without food after the first week and it was difficult to hold them together. When they finally returned, Rose was vigilant regarding the change of the policy. The first time she had occasion to overdraft, she presented her card for a charge punch. The foreman winked and said, “That will be all right.”

“But,” said Rose, “you are charging the other girls. I insist on the same treatment that the others get.”

The foreman punched the card. Rose understood then that the ringleaders were to be propitiated, but that the rank and file were to be charged enough to cover the entire loss. She went to the boss and told him that the foreman was unfair—that he had charged some of the girls for stock, she had had it from their own lips, but he had offered to favor her. The boss denied knowledge of any such arrangement. He summoned the foreman. The foreman denied that he had charged anyone. Rose appealed to the girls who had been charged—whose punched cards she had seen. In the presence of the boss and the foreman they denied that they had been charged for excess stock.

Then Rose made a speech. She told them that she understood why the girls lied—they were too poor to risk any further trouble. “I know what you are trying to do—you want to buy off those who have spirit enough to fight. Well, you cannot use me as a whip to beat the others. They are ignorant and starved. They cannot help that. You are imposing upon them, cheating them, betraying them. But I would rather stand by my fellow workers with all their ignorance and fear than to be a part of your miserable machine for conquering and tricking them.”

Two weeks afterward drew her to one side. He said, “Admire you because you are a good fighter. But can’t you see that they are not worth your sacrifice? They won’t help you in their own battle. You stay and do your work and I will see that you are treated right. Let the others take care of themselves.”

“There is no ‘themselves’ to it—it is we—the working class. We are slowly learning what we must do to get justly for our class. I am wiser than my sisters upstairs. I must, therefore, be strong for the weaker one. Perhaps I may not remember it, but I hope one day it will help me. I choose to take the chance rather than bear a wrong. We who see must fight singly until the group has learned it lesson. I cannot work in your shop any longer unless all are to be treated alike.”

Rose paused in her narrative. A paroxysm of coughing seized her. She told me hastily and somewhat carelessly that she suffered from nicotine poisoning and asthma. She would never be able to work again. The odor of tobacco made her cough incessantly and she could do no work at the stogy trade. She had se cured one or two positions as clerk or saleswoman, but the floorwalker had promptly dismissed her when he heard her cough.

Her eyes were grey and frank, and her dark hair was smoothed back from a white forehead. There was in her face a far away look of young wretchedness of the long battle. But her voice, her voice faint and weary, but light she may never see. To us she is Rose of the luminous soul—Rose of the workers’ fellowship—Rose who speaks with the surpassing eloquence of simple truth and right. Her words ring with the universal message and proud are all who can understand her language.

THE MENACE OF FATIGUE.

GUSTAVE DEER.

Man is not a natural-born laborer. The foraging for food when appetite urges, throwing up the rude shack, or hut, and caring for other personal needs such as the savage, or even the animal may have, cannot be called labor, in the sense in which we know it. Slavery, of long ages of enforced toil on the part of the multitudes was necessary before man could have been reduced to the methodical laborer that he is today.

If slavery was essential to reduce man to a system of continuous and systematic work, we are coming today to realize that leisure is essential to the higher development of the individual, to his mental and physical welfare. Overfatigue has filled the masses in a state of helplessness through the inability to develop the mental powers. Even the physical condition of the toiler is not what some idealists would have us believe it is. The wide chest, the brawny arms and sinewy neck bearing the strain of a straight spine a head covered with heavy mane, a face with flashing eye and strong-set jaw—this is the mistake.
The Peculiar Attitude of the American Woman Toward Socialism

CAROLINE NELSON

In Germany there are sixty-two thousand dues-paying women members in the Socialist party. Here in America we haven’t one thousand in the party, and it is safe to say that at least half of those are members simply because their husbands, brothers or friends have urged them to join, and that they do not take enough interest in the matter to enable them to either spread or defend Socialism in any effectual way; nor do they go to the meetings in sufficient numbers to make a respectable showing.

Now, what do I mean by a respectable showing? Simply this, that a woman shrinks instinctively from taking part or interest in something that appears to be almost exclusively a masculine affair. She fears and detests the idea of being regarded masculine, just as men detest being regarded feminine and avoids, if possible, all women’s gatherings and interests.

These are conventionalists that hold good among workers and shirkers alike. If Socialist men understood this they would make special efforts to bring their wives, sisters and lady friends to the Socialist meetings, thus proving to outsiders that Socialism concerns both sexes of the workers alike.

Another fertile source of the American woman’s contempt of Socialism that causes her to adopt a hostile attitude toward it is the capitalist press. In every worker’s home, in every public and semi-public place there is the ever-present newspaper, with its trimmed and cooked up news, half lies and half truths, always so mixed that one can never tell what is but. But the majority of women swallow the whole thing. Of course, the capitalists are fighting among themselves so that today a great deal of their graft and their thefts are perjured before the public, and the defeated capitalists are talking loudly about reform and justice, etc. But of the real theft, viz., that of robbing the worker of his products, not a word. Socialism has no place in the capitalist reform press, except one of ridicule. All this the American women feed upon mentally. True, the working class is engaged in a desperate struggle to create a press of its own, but naturally, its modest efforts do not succeed in making much of an attraction or an appeal to the American woman whose eye is ever directed to the more fashionable side of things. Working girl told me the other day that she always wanted to be nicely dressed because that was her only joy in life.

But there is every indication that very soon the working class in America will be stripped of that only joy of dressing nicely. In other words, “bluff” will have to go.

America is a new country with peculiar traditions of its own, that to a great extent are pure fiction. One of these is that democracy is the ruling power and every boy has the opportunity to make his own way up. Consequently, every girl, with an eye for the practical, is looking for the boy who is on his way. Working class? No, perish the idea. She can only keep the wrinkle invisible, to conceal her age, and her clothes up to the mark, to conceal her poverty, lie will come, or some position above the working class will be hers.

These are illusions that the ruling class wants the workers to absorb, especially the women; for they are the teachers of the young, and, therefore, to a great extent control the minds of the coming generation. However, this peculiar attitude of the American woman toward economic conditions will, by the very force of circumstances, be swept away, and within a few years there will be crying out for help and light, and giving plenty of opportunity for some new fakirs with some new religion to spread their net to ensnare her. On the other hand, it will give Socialists an opportunity to teach the truth of economic justice as the foundation of all justice and ethics and religion.

One of the functions of the Socialist movement in America today should, therefore, be to evolve teachers and speakers among women to give it its feminine force and feminine sanction. And when I say teachers and speakers, I do not necessarily mean platform performers. They are necessary, but not any more than those who can talk to the back of the room, shop and home, heart-to-heart talks with comrades in toil, while eating the noon-day lunch, or on the tramways, or while paying little visits. With such Socialist workers scattered throughout the country the prejudice will break down among women and energetically facilitate the social revolution that is marching upon us, ill prepared as we are.

WOMAN’S HAND BOOK

Every day we have letters from readers ask ing for data on the woman question—suffrage, women’s wages, women’s rights and disabilities, etc. It is very hard to send the proper reply to all of these, as it is not always in an available form. So we have decided to issue a small hand book of facts and statistics covering these points. This we can send, at 25 cents each, and this book will send us clippings, statistics, etc., to cover the case. Let every woman ask for this book, and when we have collected every item worth, we will issue it in a beautiful and books imaginable on this ever-growing topic.

CHILD LABOR.

BY RUBY ARCHER.

Poor little children that work all day—
Par from the meadows, far from the birds.
Far from the beautiful silent words.
The hills know the children ways.

Laughter has gone from your old-young eyes—
Gone from the lips with the dimples too.
Gone with the song of the little feet—
Gone the smile that was the noon.

Did the day turn back to the night so soon?
Did the monster’s face come back?
Less a lever, less than a wheel—
Pity they were not wrought of steel.

To save the peace your way—
Add the column, aye, foot the gain—
Lesser and lesser, as the day eraly away.

How will the reckoning end, that strives
To balance cold with pain?

The majority of women Socialism has always served as a sort of scare-crow. This, I believe, because that the Socialist claim is that it is on the theory of cost of labor and material.

It must not be inferred, however, that the discussion of the Socialist division of property is on the theory of cost of labor and material. The theory is that the Socialists claim ought to be owned by the people through the government in some properties which are social in nature, like coal mines, railroads, packing houses, sugar refineries, mills, factories, lighting plants, land, and so forth. These, when placed in private hands, give their owners the advantage over those who have to depend upon them for a living by placing in their control the means of subsistence (the control of the job).

Contrary to the claims of its opponents Socialism does not stand for the equal division of property among the people of the universe. It does not stand for equality of possession regardless of its economic conditions. It states that it does stand for equality of opportunity.

This then is the movement which, in spite of frightening a good many, is spreading rapidly through our great union. A number of years ago a few German exiles planted the seed of Socialism in American soil. But for a long while there was no visible result.

Not until our own day that is born with an equal chance in securing material subsistence can the human brotherhood and the growing ideal of universal peace be realized.

Socialism has no quarrel with the present system—it looks upon it as a necessary phase in the progress of evolution, in the development of the world, but one that has outlived its usefulness by this time. “Capitalism has had its day,” says the Socialist, “its mission has been fulfilled and it must now be supplanted by a new system of society.”

The consolidation of great industries and the development of the great trusts have made possible the advancing system of co-operation. “All reformers aiming at destroying the trusts or even regulating them under the present management, are doomed to fail,” justly says the Socialist. Nothing can stop the development of monopolies. But what is possible is a different process of development that will make them social—the collective property of all.

We cannot destroy the beef trust by refusing to eat meat—Mr. Armour will make his profits by raising the prices on other necessities of life that are under his control as well. But if the beef industry as well as all other industries now owned by a few privileged ones would be the common property of all the people, owned by them collectively and managed by a government of the people, the prices could easily be regulated by the value of the product based on cost of labor and material.

One of many.

I have read and heard so much about Socialism, now I would very much like to know what it is all about and whether it is good for the church and religion; if not, then why not? I am very anxious to hear the whole story about this branch of politics.

My husband is a Socialist, but I can't for the life of me understand why he is so much away so much I hardly have time to talk to him, and I generally get a little angry with him. Now, I wonder if under this wonderful Socialism a woman would see her husband once in a while, and I wonder if a woman would have a right to say anything about the management and care of her home, and family. If so, I for one would welcome Socialism. So many people say that a woman is the slave of a man; well, why this should be I can't understand. I think that a woman, being the mother of the race, should be on a higher plane than slavery. She should not be paying the equal of no man, must not be much in pain and suffering and still go uncomplainingly on as she is, and our women are so much in pain and worry. The work would not be so bad, but there is no substitute for her, and it is really sick to look at and to think of. I am getting so hurt, and the trying to please everybody, and the having to please everybody, and the responsibility of being a big show. Thank you. Mind, I am not whining. I know that I can't do everything, but I think a woman's place is in the home and as a worker, and a slave, and a slave should keep very quiet. I think that a woman just the same as a woman, and give her the same rights as a woman. I am thinking about voting and politics. I think in the home and its management and the keeping of house and of the child, should be the pleasure of any woman, as well as she has kind and gentle treatment and is not encouraged to drink or to do anything to that respect.

What I would like to see is every home being in the hands of women, with an amnestment as well as drudgery, also equal rights in all things, and the law to protect them. If so, your Socialism can and will give us these things for our women. I would like to see Socialism

The above is worth while, in that it is typical of the attitude of thousands of women today. For this reason we answer it here. In the Socialism platform we have this: “Socialism does not concern itself with religious beliefs. The Socialist party is a political organization. It cannot advocate any politics. Protestant and people of every shade of thought and belief, just as does any other political party. If it did not, it would not be true to its principles of granting ‘freedom of speech and of the press.’”

Under Socialism it is supposed that a woman will “have something to say about the management of her home.” This, however, will depend upon the disposition of the parties concerned in the domestic arrangement. Purely personal affairs that do not concern society in general must be regulated by the individuals themselves.

A woman is the slave of a slave today, because she is dependent upon a man for her support. If he is a poor workingman, that support must be of necessity meager, and she naturally suffers more than he does through their poverty. Let her children, and nothing else by giving them both a fair chance for activity in social production, with full return for their labor. The fear of illness and accidents to children will be greatly reduced through the introduction of preventive medicines, better homes, trained nurses, pure medicines, etc.

Socialism will give men and women representatives are made. And yet—the American movement is still very small when compared with the Socialist movements of Europe, which control the destinies of nations and empires.

No one can tell, though, perhaps the red flag will yet, even in our time, wave over the capital at Washington, side by side with the stars and stripes.
IN studying music, the method is the most important thing to consider, because the time it takes and the cost all hinge on it.

You might spend a large sum of money in trying various teachers and methods, only to find in the end, that you had wasted your money, which wouldn't be so bad if the trouble ended there, but it doesn't. You have learned a lot of things that aren't so—all have to be unlearned; that's time worse than lost. Start right!

Know before you start that you are starting right. If we don't furnish convincing proofs of the superiority of The Quinn-Campbell Conservatory of Music's home study method, you will not be out anything, but if we do, you will thank us for your dying day.

Best of all, we pay your tuition; all you need to do is to give in exchange a few hours' help. When we receive your request for particulars, they will go by return mail. Why not fill out coupon and mail today?

A good many requests have come in asking us to get out a book of dialogues and speeches for children. We believe such a booklet very necessary in our movement, but do not like to undertake its publication until we are sure that orders sufficient to cover the cost will come in. So we have decided to settle the question by asking for advance orders for a 10c booklet of Socialist dialogues and speeches for children. This will be a 64-page affair, with the very best material we can collect. As we will have to have orders for at least 500 copies before going to press, you had better take the matter up with your locals, clubs, etc., and have them send for all they can use. This will also help to stimulate their interest in the activity of the children. Let no one delay in taking this matter up, as we will not want to keep the first orders waiting too long. You need not send money until the books are ready for delivery.

CAPSHEAF
The Safety Pin Without a Coil

SAFETY-to-the person and for the fabric pinned

Since the first safety pins were invented many improvements have made them still safer for the user. The safety of the fabric pinned was not considered—until the inventor of the "Capsheaf" made a safety pin without the coil spring which catches and tears the clothing. Send postal to 101 Franklin St., New York City, for free samples. Use "Capsheaf" once and you will always use it.

THE NEWSPAPER BOY

ALFRED NENES.

Elif of the city, a lean little hollow-eyed boy. Running errands, and a tip of a slip of the spring.

Undauntedly he runs with a reckless joy.
Shouting a murderer's doom or the death of a king.

Out of the darkness he leaps, like a wild, stranger hurt.
Humor of tragedy comedy, crime, and despair.
Waving a poster that burns you, in fierce black lettering.

One word, "Mystery," under the lamp's white glare.

THE FENCE OR THE AMBULANCE

"Twas a dangerous cliff, as they freely confessed.
Though to walk near its crest was so pleasant.
But over its terrible edge there had slipped some souls.

So the people said something would have to be done.

But their projects did not at all tally.

Some said, "Put a fence round the edge of the cliff.

Some "An ambulance down in the valley.

But the cry for the ambulance carried the day,
For it spread through the neighboring city.
A fence may be useful or not, it is true.
But each heart was filled with pity.

For those that slipped over that dangerous cliff.

And the dwellers in hovels and alley.

Gave pound or gave pence, not to put up a fence.
But an ambulance down in the valley.

"For the cliff is all right, if you're careful, they said.

And if folks even slip or are dropping.
It isn't the slipping that hurts them so much.

As the shock down below when they're stop ning.

Then an old sage remarked: "It's a marvel to me how more attentive.
To guarding results than to stopping the cause.
When they'd much better aim prevention.

"Let us stop at its source all this mischief," cried he.

"Come, neighbors and friends, let us rally if the cliff we'll fence, we might guard the shiftless.

But the few kept on urging, teaching and preach ing.

And the line on the field of the battle grew longer.

For sooner or later the people must see.
That the fact that the fiction is stronger.
So rouse ye! arouse ye! and up with fence.

The only protection from death in the valley.

Arose y' arouse ye! and answer the call
"Round the Socialist banner to rally!"

Our Socialistic Sunday School

How many of you, little comrades, have attended a Socialist Sunday school?

I am quite sure that those who did enjoyed it.

Now, I am going to tell you about our Sunday school, which was organized only last December at the Socialistic club of Yorkville, in New York. It is con ducted by Comrade Nichtenh, whom all the children like very much.

Although I myself am a grown-up, I enjoy being at Sunday school once in awhile, and hears how the boys and girls tell of all the things that happen.

The Red Flag with great enthusiasm. But besides singing, they learn other nice things. They learn about the forest dwellers, they recite pieces, but what they always learn is to love their fellow comrades.

Just think, once Comrade Nichtenh arranged an entertainment and the grown-ups were entertained by the fel low tots, some of them not older than three years.

Don't you think it must have been lots of fun? Almost every Sunday, at least when the weather is nice, Comrade Nichtenh takes the chil dren to the park after school is over.

One Sunday my sister and I went along.

We walked and walked, until we came at last, I suppose, to a place where you all know what a zoo is. It is a place in the park where all the wild animals are caged up.

I think it is cruel to keep all those free dom-loving animals behind bars where they can't move about freely, don't you?

Still, they are very interesting to look at and we enjoyed them, aside from our sympathy, very much.

In May Sunday school closes, and until then the children will save up their pennies and give them to Comrade Nichtenh, so that she may get them a beautiful banner. I don't know exactly how it will look, but I think it will be very pretty. Then the children will have another entertainment and a May fair.

Now, don't you think it must be nice to have a Socialist Sunday school if you don't have any in your local, or town, please tell your papa or mama that they should see to it, that next winter you may have one.

Now my little comrades, wishing you all success in getting a Sunday school,
I remain in good comradeship.

HELEN LOWY.

SUMMON THE WEE BATTALIONS

Burr little children come unto me, and be blessed not; for such is the kingdom of God.

Out of the lanes and alleys.
Out of the vile purrills.

Summon the wee battalions.
Pass them in long review.

Grinny and razee and faced.
May, if you choose, with a tear.

"These are the ones of His kingdom,
Who, having no care, if they are not fed,
Will work the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Heaven.

Hear to the kingdom of brute,
Bound in the hands of sin.

What have ye done to uplift them,
Some whom you think have no hand?

Oh, tiny and worn, unkept and forlorn,
Of your heritage fell.

Then faces, the wee, weary faces,
Veil their yellow down.

Who from His kingdom tore them?
And from their hands cruelly stripped?

Folk of the stately churches,
Here is the baby nest.

Heirs to a kingdom blue.

Marked with the grim word, "Lost!"

The faces, the old, old faces,
Bodies so meek and mild.

Whose is the hand that crushed them?
And made them more than His foe?

Suffer the little children?
Is this the answer we hear?

That they live their lives in the haunts and block of their forlorn hell.

Women and the Trades
ELIZABETH BEARDSLEY BUTLER

This is the first general survey of the opportunities open to wage-earning women in an American city, and is compiled by Elizabeth Beardsley Butler, former secretary of the Consumers' League of New Jersey. It tells of the 22,000 men of Pittsburg, Pa., who work in great shops beside the men. These men give up from 14 to 50, ten per cent of them (2,800 women) living away from their homes. Less than two per cent are in touch with social agencies or recreation. English speaking girls hold the positions for which a few months training and some intelligence are needed. Italian girls, hindered by ambition, scarcely figure. In a limited coterie of industries immigrant Jewesses hold positions beside girls of native birth. Inferior and unpleasant work is added to Slavic immigrants, and these women, sometimes by sheer physical length and sometimes by personal indifference and a low standard, compete on a basis of lower wages for men's work which otherwise would never have been given girls to do. The place of the Slav is that of the woman fighting for her right.

The Mills of Mammon
BY JAS. H. BROWER

491 pages—vellum de luxe cloth—eight illustrations—Price $1.00

THE HOTTEST STORY YOU EVER READ!

It digs to the roots of our social sinning—exposes the WHITE SLAVE TRADE in words that burn, and goes after INDUSTRIAL ARCHERY in a way that will delight you. The author has boldly stepped across the line that divides polite twaddle from burning realism and has written a powerful story dealing with the forces that make for social decay.

I Am Delighted With It, Says Debs

The Mills of Mammon, by James H. Brower, has been a long time in the writing. I have read this book through my confidence in the author a long time ago, and I have been eagerly looking for it ever since. At last it has come, and I am delighted with it. It is a large book, almost five hundred pages, strikingly illustrated and gotten up in admirable style, and it has all the appearance of a standard work inside and outside, and when I say it is a large book, I mean it is a large book in every sense of the word. This book is not written in a hurry; it has been years in preparation, and is the ripe product of the author's genius.

James H. Brower is one of the most highly educated and best equipped men in the Socialist movement. On the platform he is eloquent, logical, eloquent, versatile, he is filled with his subject and holds his audience in the palm of his hand. As a writer, he is graceful, brilliant and imaginative. Not alone are he the master of the economics of his subject, his history and its sequence, but has the rare imagination of the poet, which gives to his work the charm that is second only to the sound instruction imparted to his readers. *EUGENE V. Food That’s Food……PRIMEL

DEALERS are eager to sell you from their overstocks of cereals, which prove slow after the peanut hull expose, and much of it you may now expect to find generously "predigested" or very much alive with weevil, common to most package cereals. The surest safeguard there is to secure a supply of PRIMEL direct from the factory, fresh, and free at all times from weevils. Coarse, 30c.; making a barrel bulk; takes lower claim on your pocket. No danger from weevil, keeps longer than flour, will reduce grocery bills, supply more meals of "good eating," more satisfying than anything you can serve the family.

New Rates on Cooking Oil

The advance in prices has hit the oil market hard the past month; quotations of previous dates are canceled, but with all the advance, you are yet the gainer by forty or fifty per cent when using NUTOL, Odorless Cooking Oil. The wide popularity of this product has brought all manner of cheap oils into the retail trade. Several of our customers attempted to give these cheaper offerings a trial, have come back with larger orders, saying "nothing so good for us as NUTOL." Fact is, the salad oil manufacturers are selling you for $2.00 a gallon, in small bottles, no better oil than we supply you at one dollar, yet they brand it "pure olive oil."

In Denver, the women voters have a secured ordinances placing drinking fountains in the streets, garbage receptacles in the corners, and seats at the transfer stations of the street cars; forbidding espousal in public places; parking 25th avenue and planting trees.

Ellis Meredith, of Denver, says that equal suffrage has also led to a much better enforcement of the laws prohibiting child labor.

Mrs. Ione T. Hanna, the first woman ever elected to the school board of Denver and one of the most highly respected women of that city, writes:

"Some results of equal suffrage in Colorado are generally conceded: (1) it has proved moral quality of candidates nominated for office by the various parties; (2) a decidedly increased observance of courtesies and decencies of life at the forefront by political headquarters; (3) better and more orderly poll taking; (4) general awakening interest among both men and women, in matters of public, health, comfort and safety."

Comrade Fred Warren's case comes up in court of appeals in Minneapolis, Minn. the end of this month. If you want to know this case you should send for (or a fine 32c) a fine photo post card photo and you will receive it at once.
