BROOKLYN. A member of the Brooklyn Socialists was seen walking down the street with a girl. They were chuckling and singing as they went.

A man was then introduced, the agent of the Socialist Party. He walked up to the group and began to talk. He explained the principles of the Socialist Party and how it could help the workers. The group listened attentively and asked many questions. The agent answered them all and the group was convinced.

He then handed the group a copy of The Socialist, a newspaper published by the Socialist Party. They read it and were impressed by the articles and the ideas expressed. They decided to join the Socialist Party and support its work.

The meeting ended with the group singing the Socialist anthem. They were determined to fight for a better world and to help the workers everywhere.
FRENCH SOCIALISTS.

Their Attitude to Labor Discipline and Union Organization.

A few weeks ago a certain union of French socialists met at its annual meeting in which the union's officers were elected. The union, which is known as the "Labour Party," consists of about 20,000 members, and is the largest labor union in France.

At the meeting, the union's officers were elected by secret ballot. The president of the union is M. Pierre Boulat, who is also the leader of the socialist party in the French Chamber of Deputies. The vice-presidents are M. Edouard Herriot and M. Paul Deschanel, who are both members of the socialist party.

The union's officers are elected for a term of three years, and each officer is entitled to serve a maximum of six years. The officers are responsible for the management of the union's funds, and for the administration of its affairs.

The union's constitution provides that the officers shall be elected by the members of the union, and that the union's rules shall be approved by a majority of the members present at the meeting.

The union's constitution also provides that the officers shall be responsible for the maintenance of discipline within the union, and for the prevention of any acts of violence or other offenses against the law.

The union's officers are also responsible for the publication of the union's journal, which is called "Le Socialiste." The journal is published in Paris, and is issued once a week.

The union's officers are also responsible for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Workingmen's Association, and for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Labour Bureau.

The union's officers are also responsible for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Commerce, and for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Mines.

The union's officers are also responsible for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Agriculture, and for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Electricity.

The union's officers are also responsible for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Telegraphs, and for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Steam Navigation.

The union's officers are also responsible for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Insurance, and for the representation of the union at the meetings of the International Chamber of Banking.
