Walter Crane and Socialism.

"Life's Awful Balance.

"At last she said, "I can't bear it any longer."

"Well, I am all for the cure," said her husband."

"But what is it you want me to do?"

"She replied."

"I want you to get the cure."

"But what cure, my dear?"

"The one you are always talking about."

"The one you always promise me."

"The one you always say is wonderful."

"Yes, yes, I know."

"I want you to get it."

"But what is it?"

"It is the cure for the diseases of life."

"I see."

"It is the cure for all the sufferings and pains and sorrows of life."

"I understand."

"I want you to get it."

"But how can I get it?"

"You must go to the doctor."

"The doctor?"

"Yes, the doctor."

"But the doctor is far away."

"I know."

"What will I do then?"

"You can write to the doctor."

"Write to the doctor?"

"Yes, write to the doctor."

"I will write to the doctor."

"That's good."

"But what will the doctor say?"

"He will say that the cure is wonderful."

"Wonderful?"

"Yes, wonderful."

"Then I will get the cure."

"That's good."

"Thank you."
CASUAL OBSERVATIONS.
By Jerome Hamner, Baltimore.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad's excursion trip was the first such inaugurated in the history of the road. It was an event of great interest and excitement, and the scenes it offered to the eyes of travelers who had never seen such a place before, were truly wonderful. The different stations along the way were illuminated with electric lights, and the engines were decorated with streamers and bunting. The passengers were entertained with music and speeches, and the atmosphere was full of joy and excitement. The trip was a great success, and it is to be hoped that it will be repeated in the future.
