The concentration of capital in private hands is a problem in society. Capitalists are often seen as greedy and selfish, but the reality is more complex. The concept of a "walled garden" is often used to describe the concentration of capital.

A Word About the Value Theory of Capitalist Profits.

What the boss of the Western Canadian Federation of Labour declares that the so-called "value theory of capitalist profits" is "an absolutely unanswerable proposition" is tantamount to saying that all theories are unanswerable.

"It is not necessary," he continues, "to go into the whole theory of the labor movement. You can impress any young man with the idea of competition and you can impress others with the idea of Ruth's Laws of Population, and "everybody" will believe the dictionary and the Bible without question.

"The value theory of capital is an absolutely unanswerable proposition. The more money you have, the more you can make, and the more profit you make. This is the philosophy of the Bosses of America."

"The Bosses of America believe that all wealth is concentrated in the hands of the few. The more money they have, the more money they can make. They believe in competition and in the "Gospel of Ruth". They believe that the more profit they make, the more wealth they can accumulate."
