FAMINE AND FAMINE.

Current reports state that there is a great famine impending in Russia. The bread region of the country is in terrible straits, and consular reports indicate that millions of human beings will perish by the fall of this year.

We understand that there are famines and famines. Yet some years a famine has been raging in hundreds of thousands of villages in Russia, and in a few years, the adaptation of the people to conditions will make the famine a thing of the past.

The great famine of the early 1920s was caused by the government's policies of collectivization and forced labor, which led to widespread starvation. This famine was not caused by a lack of food, but rather by the government's policies and actions.

In this case, the government's policies and actions are directly responsible for the famine. The government's failure to provide adequate food and resources to the population has led to widespread hunger and suffering.

In conclusion, it is crucial for the government to take immediate action to address the famine and ensure the well-being of its citizens. The government must prioritize the welfare of its people and work towards a sustainable and equitable food system that can meet the needs of all.
