Cabinet Out in France
Blows Tris To Form New Regime; Uncertainties Among Workers

Although the victory of the left under General Charles de Gaulle's leadership was called a “cabinet coup” by the President, Jean Monnet, and the government of the day, the government is still attempting to form a new cabinet. The move is seen as a major setback for the de Gaulle regime, which had promised to bring about a new era of political stability.

The new government was formed after a series of meetings between the President and various political leaders. The government is expected to be led by Jean Monnet, who has been called the “father of the European Union.”

De Gaulle and Monnet met on Friday, and the President announced that he had accepted Monnet’s offer to form a new government. The new government will reportedly include a number of key figures from the left, including the former prime minister, Lionel Jospin.

The move comes after a series of political upheavals in France in recent weeks, including the resignation of the interior minister, who was accused of corruption.

The new government will face a number of challenges, including the ongoing crisis in the eurozone and the need to address the high levels of unemployment in France.

Beware of War-Makers!

To the editors of the National Council, in reply to Mr. Johnson's letter: We are all aware of the danger that war poses to our country and its people. It is crucial that we take action to prevent such a disaster from occurring. We must be vigilant and proactive in our efforts to ensure peace and prosperity for all.
