The Workers' Call

From Press Notes of International Socialist Review.

That is the present moment in a critical state in the history of the world, when socialism, the struggle for the liberation of the working class, is making a rapid advance. The fact is, that both within and without the walls of America, there is a very extensive and rapid movement toward the establishment of socialism, which has carried with it the support of a large and influential section of the working class.

But what is this movement which we are witnessing throughout the world? It is the result of the growing dissatisfaction of the working class with capitalist society. It is the result of the awakened consciousness of the working class of their social position and of their economic exploitation. It is the result of the growing realization that the capitalist system is not only economically unjust, but also socially and morally degrading.

The movement is not confined to any particular country. It is not confined to any particular class. It is not confined to any particular group. It is not confined to any particular section of the working class. It is not confined to any particular idea. It is not confined to any particular creed.

It is a movement which is sweeping over the world, and which is reaching its highest point in the United States at the present time. It is a movement which is not only on the increase, but is also on the rise. It is a movement which is not only on the rise, but is also on the grow.

As for the question of what is the object of this movement, there can be no doubt that it is the question of whether the working class shall be subjected to the capitalist system of wage labor, or whether it shall be subjected to the socialist system of co-operative production.

The question of what is the object of this movement, there can be no doubt that it is the question of whether the working class shall be subjected to the capitalist system of wage labor, or whether it shall be subjected to the socialist system of co-operative production.

The question of whether the working class shall be subjected to the capitalist system of wage labor, or whether it shall be subjected to the socialist system of co-operative production, is not a question of the present moment. It is a question of the future. It is a question of the future which is now upon us. It is a question of the future which is now upon us. It is a question of the future which is now upon us.

Socialism and Immediate Demands.

The Social Democratic Party, as we are wont to call it here, is the outgrowth of an idea, if not of a scheme, the purpose of which is to promote social reform and to establish a system of Socialism in this country. The idea of Socialism is not new; it has been discussed by many and many have attempted to carry it out. The Social Democratic Party, however, is the first to attempt to carry it out in this country, and it is to be hoped that it will be successful.

The Social Democratic Party is not a political party in the usual sense of the word. It is not a party of a particular political group, but it is a party of all who believe in the principles of Socialism. It is a party of all who believe that the working class should have control of the government, and that the government should be controlled by the working class.
