One and the Same Thought

By JOE SARTWELL

Not a sailor in the company knew why he was about hanging his head. No one knew what was going on, and yet it was well known that some way or other that was the point in the way.

People seemed to think that the whole thing had been planned for a while.

And so, with a kind of patient endurance, they waited and watched, hoping that the storm would pass.

And so it did.

END OF THE STORY

The song was just a chance of bad luck.

Adams Tells How He "Confessed"

"Dirty" McPartland Dictated the Story as Part of a Parody Plot

Walter Adams, the head of the U.S. Bureau of Internal Revenue and a former San Francisco police officer, has made a "sweeping confession" in the case of the U.S. government's attempt to recover lost revenue. Adams, who has been convicted of embezzlement and theories of tax evasion, has admitted to a plot to defraud the government.

The plot involved the dictation of a story to the press by "Dirty" McPartland, an acquaintance of Adams. The story, which was never published, was intended to provide ammunition for Adams's defense in his trial.

The plot was exposed by police, who found the dictation of the story on a typewriter. The story was never published, but it is believed to have contained information that could have been used to implicate Adams in the embezzlement.

ADAMS EXPECTED TO BE ACQUITTED

Walter Adams's attorneys have made several requests for a new trial, but the government has denied these requests. It is expected that Adams will be acquitted in the trial, which is expected to begin next week.
