Industrial Unionism and the Revolution

By J. J. Murphy

From The Workers’ Drought (English)

However desirable a perfect weapon in the conflict of classes may be, the ideal of its universal application is an unattainable dream.

The confusion of means in so widely divergent a class as ours, where the great mass of the laboring millions are in a state of destitution, is not to be expected.

The question of social legislation is a matter of necessity, provided the government is not to be permitted to pass laws that will retard or prevent the desired end.

We are told that in the making of a new order of society we must not overlook the fact that the machinery of government is a necessary agent in the working out of our program.

The goal of our revolution is a free society, where the working class shall be the masters of the earth, the owners of the means of production and distribution, and the possessors of the wealth of the nation.

There is no such thing as a social revolution, a class struggle, or a struggle for freedom, unless there is a clear understanding on the part of the working class of the necessity for their own action to bring about the desired end.

The working class is not to be permitted to be swayed by the mere words of the reformers, who are only interested in the maintenance of the status quo.

The working class must learn to understand the necessity of its own action in the making of a new order of society.

The future of our revolution is in the hands of the working class, and we must be prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to bring about the desired end.

The Shop Floor Stealers

By Walter C. Smith

While the whole labor movement has been fighting with cir- cumstances over the question of union organization, the so-called Big Union has moved quietly up to the door of the shop and taken away the job as a trade. The shop-floor organization, which has been driven underground, has been the subject of much discussion in the last few months. Many union leaders have been forced to think about the problem of organizing the shop floor. This need has been felt for a long time, but it has been only recently that the necessity for such action has been recognized.

The shop-floor organization has been an important issue in the labor movement. It is not only a question of organizing the shop floor, but also of increasing the efficiency of the shop. The shop-floor organization has been a force for good, and it is important that it be strengthened.

The Workers' World

What is The Government?

The straight strike is the most formidable challenge that has ever been offered to the rule of the capitalist class. And the workers' struggle is also the most formidable challenge that has ever been offered to the rule of the capitalist class.

The workers must be victorious. We must hang on and fight, and never give in. We must not be discouraged. We must not lose heart. We must not lose hope.

The revolt which took place in Russia and resulted in the victory of the workers is going on in Europe today, though it is slower and more hidden, and the workers' demand for the establishment of a classless society is still not fully realized.

The workers' struggle is the struggle of all men to live. It is the struggle of the workers for the abolition of the capitalist class.
