What’s The Trouble With America?
By John Reed

In the summer of 1918, American manufacturers were busy turning out munitions for the War, as were the workers in the factories, but many of the workers were not satisfied with their work. They were tired of working 12 hours a day, 7 days a week, and they wanted better wages and working conditions. The American Federation of Labor called a strike, but it was not successful.

A new strike broke out in the fall of 1918, and this time it was successful. The workers won better wages and working conditions, and the strike was a turning point in the history of the American labor movement.

The government was not pleased with the strike, and it tried to stop it. But the workers were determined, and they refused to give up.

The strike was a victory for the workers, and it showed that they were not afraid to fight for their rights. The government realized that it had to change its policies, and it did.

The result was a better world for the workers, and a stronger labor movement. The world was a better place, and the workers were the winners.

The workers of the world will not be satisfied with any wages or terms of labor the treaty (ratification) will provide. The treaty, as we have said before, was an act of war against the working classes.

And the revolution will come sooner, harder, and more severe than ever before. The working class will not tolerate such conditions. It will fight for its rights and its dignity.

And it will win.

The Call of the Century

The battle cry of the working class is: "Rise up! Fight! Win!"

And the working class will.
