The Political Situation in Germany,

By Walter Sitzer (Berlin)

The political situation in Germany is undoubtedly becoming more and more acute. In the ranks of the working class, young men who are growing tired of the government's reactionary policies feel a deep sense of despair. Every new development is to be seen, due to the first class of events, as a definite step towards the socialist revolution. Germany's political and economic life has continued for almost a year and a half on a series of serious effects of the economic situation on the middle class and the working class. Germany's political life is revealed on occasions that the legions of the republican democratic party will probably not yet end with the acceptance of the democratic government and the bourgeois parliament. The international situation will probably remain as it was, but in actuality events have been developing in the direction of a definite step towards the socialist revolution.

It is clear that with such a development tendency to consolidate the bourgeois bloc along with increasing assets and resources of the working class, the social democratic party, and in the case of the present situation, the most active party of those parties in the present crisis. The broad sections of the working class have been on a stage of transformation, and the pending events are demanding and insisting on a left party, a Republic party, and the workers' party in the social democratic movement. The political situation at present is such that the workers of all parties, and especially of the socialist parties, are demanding and insisting on a new policy, a new government, and in the interest of the people, a new parliament. The situation is such that decisions and actions of the government and parliament are demanded without delay.

The Political Situation in Germany.

By Walter Stocker (Berlin).

The political situation in Germany is undoubtedly becoming more and more acute. In the ranks of the working class and among the democratic, revolutionary, and Social-Democratic elements, there is a growing feeling of helplessness. The left development is to be seen, not solely in the ranks of the democratic and Social-Democratic parties, but also among the rank and file of the working class. The workers, no longer able to sec ever real progress in the social system, are ever more deeply imbued with the idea that the class struggle must be fought in its purest form, which means the struggle for the abolition of capital and the establishment of a true socialist order.

The right-wing parties, on the other hand, are now being forced to see the need for action. They have been left without the support of the masses, and this has led to a sharp increase in their own ranks. The Social-Democrats have begun to talk of the need for a "national" policy, which means the support of the imperialist, anti-socialist forces. The right wing is rapidly gaining ground, and the working class is finding itself in an ever more difficult position.

The government, which is now controlled by the右翼 parties, is determined to crush the revolution and eliminate all political opposition. The workers are faced with a desperate situation, and the only hope of salvation lies in the organization of a united front of all the revolutionary forces. The task of the workers is to fight, to struggle, to organize, and to prepare for the final battle against the power of capital. The workers must not lose heart, but must continue to fight, to resist, to struggle, and to win the struggle for the liberation of the working class.
