New York Furriers Go Over the Top

By Joseph Zack

Friday, June 3 at 6:00 A.M., a group of about 3,000 workers struck, thereby making the fur workers join the growing list of labor strikers. The district was bristling with police all day, as the local labor organization had posted a large picket line at every entrance and exit. The workers were determined to make the strike a success.

Martial law is the only term that could possibly describe the scene. Finally, the gaunters of the A.F.L. reorganization committee picked up their mighty clubs and went to work. The workers were not aware of what was happening, but they were not adverse to the idea of fighting back. Some, in fact, welcomed the conflict.

Negotiated negotiations are as rare as an egg in the desert of adventure. Matthew Wolf, leader of the local furriers' union, was in a position of strength and had the backing of the A.F.L. The negotiation ceased on the afternoon of the strike, and the workers were left to decide for themselves what to do.

AFL Joint Board called a meeting to discuss the situation. The workers were present and listened to the words of their leaders. They were informed that the strike would continue until a new agreement was reached.

The workers were determined to fight for their rights. They were tired of being exploited and wanted a fair wage and working conditions. They were ready to fight for their rights.

STRIKING THE ENEMIES

By Jack Harvey

June 3--The furriers strike is on today. The New York Times reported the news. The strike was called in response to the inability of the workers to negotiate a fair contract. The employers offered a wage increase of only 50 cents per week, which was refused by the workers.

Successful Mass-Picketing

June 3--The furriers strike is on today. The New York Times reported the news. The strike was called in response to the inability of the workers to negotiate a fair contract. The employers offered a wage increase of only 50 cents per week, which was refused by the workers.

AFL Reactionaries Demand Severe Sentences for Picketers

June 8--According to the New York Times, the workers and the public are in a state of shock and fear. The strike has been declared illegal by the authorities, and the workers are being arrested. The authorities are cracking down on the workers, and the strike is unlikely to succeed.

Notes on the Furriers Strike

June 3--The furriers strike is on today. The New York Times reported the news. The strike was called in response to the inability of the workers to negotiate a fair contract. The employers offered a wage increase of only 50 cents per week, which was refused by the workers.

The authorities have been cracking down on the workers, and the strike is unlikely to succeed. The workers are being arrested and the strike is unlikely to succeed.

The authorities have been cracking down on the workers, and the strike is unlikely to succeed. The workers are being arrested and the strike is unlikely to succeed.